It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

THIS LITTLE VOLUME OF THE FIRST SERIES OF THE POPES' LIVES
Is Inscribed
To WILLIAM HERBERT, ESQ., OF CLYTHA, UNDER WHOSE HONOURED ROOF
IT WAS COMPLETED.

P R E F A C E.

THE object of this work is to give a simple consecutive account of the lives of the early Popes. It is taken partly from Bartholomew Platina, of Cremona, who wrote by order of Pope Sixtus IV., and dedicated his work to him, and partly from Alphonsus Ciaconi, a Dominican, supplemented by Father Oldoin, S.J., with occasional reference to Baronius and others. In his preface, Platina justly observes that the true history of illustrious men is a great benefit to mankind, enabling posterity to converse with men of past times, to take counsel with them, and imitate their virtues as if they saw them living. It is a study that contributes to true civilization and practical progress in every department of knowledge, so much so, that authors who have well described the actions of celebrated men, are reckoned among the first of mankind for wisdom and intelligence. But above all, the lives of the Popes are calculated to give honour to God, glory to the Church, and good examples to men, for it is they who have been the keepers of the Christian commonwealth, and by their labours and sufferings have preserved it upon earth under God, until now, without stain and immaculate. They form a race of princes or kings, whose succession is unbroken from Christ our Lord, and on the throne established by Him, the chair of St. Peter. Scarce any writer, says Platina, has taken pains to compose a history of them with any pretence to elegance and beauty, excepting one of themselves, Pope Damasus, who was an accomplished scholar. In modern times Protestants have attempted to write their histories, but from their point of view the Popes are for the most part actuated by such motives as those which influence ordinary men and politicians. Hence to read them is a painful task. Non-Catholic writers cannot form in their minds the focus from which to throw a clear light on the objects they present to view. As St. Teresa expresses it, the "glass is broken, and the speculum, or reflective power, is all in pieces."

In traversing the course of remote ages less commonly known, this simple work will be acceptable to those who wish to form a summary acquaintance with the grand personages who in ancient times have filled the majestic place of the Princes of the Church in the chair of St. Peter.

Their lives necessarily imply a notice of contemporary emperors and kings or other leading men of the times, as oppressors or favourers of Christianity. At first they were the persecutors of the Church, and afterwards its servants or nursing fathers, or not unfrequently its disobedient children or its tyrannical oppressors.

Consequently, in perusing the lives of the heads of Christendom, we must obtain a general history of all that is most momentous in the civilized world, so that this is a sufficient commendation of the work to all who desire the diffusion of useful Christian knowledge. It has no pretension to be more than a brief popular compilation.

It may seem strange to some that comparatively little is recorded of many Popes, and so much is said of contemporary emperors ; but in the scene of history the prominent personages are those who figure as dominant in the world. The Popes in the early times were hidden ; they had no celebrated historians. The great writers of the world speak of their own great men, of whom they make a wonder, and in a certain sense they are wonderful, otherwise they would not be made much of, and they rise and fall, come and go upon the stage like, in the visions of the Apocalypse, beast rises after beast, at whom the world for a time wonders. The victims of their cruelty and persecution are comparatively insignificant or unpleasant subjects for historians, and they serve only as a foil to set off the importance of these heroes among men.

Yet it is these humble men of suffering and patience in the truth who are the real centre of the world's history. It was with the Saints and their lives that the history of the world dealt in the Book of Books before Christ came, though the acts of the kings of Judah and of Israel are more prominently recorded. It is still with the Saints' lives that Christian history deals since Christ came.

In our own day, the prominent personages who have attracted the admiration of the world have been an iron-souled politician, a successful bravo, a jovial king, while saintly pontiffs, more important without comparison in reality, are wronged with impunity, and their wrongs passed over in silence, or noted only with a passing sneer.

This first little volume may stand alone as giving the early Popes down to the time of Constantine, or may be followed by others according as its usefulness and success may determine.

CHAPTER I.

ST. PETER.

FIRST PERSECUTION UNDER NERO.

JESUS is the name of the Saviour of men ; Christ the name of their King ; for by their anointing, the kings of the people of God were distinguished, as other earthly monarchs by the purple. Priests and prophets were also anointed ; but The Anointed, or the Messia, is a King. Christ came to establish the throne of David, and to reign upon the earth.

After His death and resurrection, which are the foundations of the Christian faith, the Apostles received the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, and declared to assembled nations at Jersusalem the Passion and Resurrection of the Son of God. Peter and John, fishermen, were the chiefs of these. The twelve under Peter, who took the place of Christ as shepherd of the flock, lived in poverty, receiving the contributions of the faithful for the good of the community which they served as the ministers of God. What remained over from the general necessities and their own wants they distributed to the poor. Peter remained five years at Jerusalem, of which he ordained James the Less bishop, being assisted in the ordination by St. James and St. John, thus establishing the precedent that a bishop should be consecrated by three bishops—this fact is recorded by Pope Anacletus.

When the Apostles parted company to preach to the world, Thomas went to Persia and Scinde, Matthew to Abyssinia, Bartholomew to Bactria and Armenia, Andrew to the Scythians of the north, John to Asia Minor, where he outlived the rest to see the world Christian, and resided at Ephesus. Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia and Cappadocia fell to the lot of Peter, who in the sixth year went to Antioch, where he founded the Church, and held it as his see for seven years, during which time he often visited Jerusalem. Tiberius, and after him Caligula, were emperors at Rome. This last cruel monster was put to death in the third year of his empire, leaving, it is said, a chest of poisons so deadly, that they infected the sea into which they were thrown by command of Claudius.

In the sixth year of his Pontificate at Antioch, Peter, being at Jerusalem after the martyrdom of James, was put in prison by Herod, from which he was miraculously delivered by an angel. He then retired from Jerusalem, and took his journey to Rome, the particulars of which are given by Ciaconi from ancient sources. Going to Cesarea, he made Zachæus bishop there. From thence he passed to Sidon, Beyrout, and Tripoli ; then to Ortosa, An-tandrus, Aradus, and Laodicea; from Laodicea to Antioch, where he ordained Evodius bishop.

Passing from thence to Nicomedia and Ilium, he ordained Cornelius bishop and Lazarus priest, and, proceeding to Ephesus and Smyrna, crossed into Macedonia. At Philippi he ordained Olympus; at Thessalonica, Jason; at Corinth, Silanus. From Corinth he went to Sicily, and then to Naples. At Naples he cured Asprenas by a miracle, touching him with his staff, and ordained him Bishop of Naples. The Church of the Altar of St. Peter preserves the tradition of his saying Mass there. From Naples he is said to have gone by sea to Leghorn and Pisa; and so, in the second year of Claudius, he entered Rome, A.D. 45.

From this year dates the commencement of the Pontificate of Peter and the Papacy at Rome, with its Divine commission to rule upon earth, with the power of binding and loosing, and with the Keys that open and shut. Rome, as head and mistress of the known world, was naturally chosen for the seat of Heaven's vicegerent. Humble as his entrance was into the Eternal City, he came to found a kingdom to last to the world's end, and to verify the words of Christ: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And to thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven." He stayed three years in Rome; first in the Jewish quarters, in the Trastevere, and afterwards in the house of the Senator Pudens, on the Viminal. He was accompanied from Antioch by Apollinaris, Clement, Mar-tialis, Priscus, and by Mark, either at this time or on his return to Rome from the East, which he revisited, after three years' residence in Rome, to hold the Council in Jerusalem.

The preaching of Christianity probably caused disturbance and sedition among the Jews in Rome, as a passage in Tacitus seems to imply; and Claudius the emperor gave command for the banishment of the Jews. He also repressed a tumult of the Jews, caused by some false prophets in Judea, making Cumanus procurator, in whose time thirty thousand are said to have been trampled to death in the gates of the Temple at the time of the Passover. This emperor, the uncle of Caligula, spared by him for his supposed imbecility, died poisoned by his niece Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus, whom he unlawfully married, after an empire of thirteen years. He added Britain to the Roman Empire, and the Orkney Isles.

Peter, after preaching in the East, returned to Rome in the second year of Nero, and wrote his first Epistle, which he sent by Silvanus. At the request of the Romans, he committed to Mark the task of writing his Gospel. St. Mark, as St. Jerome relates, was a priest of the tribe of Levi, baptised by St. Peter; and in his Gospel, which had Peter's approval, he exhibits in a special manner the royal character of Christ. Sent by Peter to Egypt, he founded the Church of Alexandria, where, as Philo Judæus records, he lived in great sanctity of life, and died a martyr in the eighth year of Nero, and was succeeded by Anianus.

Apollinaris was also ordained bishop by St. Peter, and sent to Ravenna, where, having preached the Gospel, he was taken by the priests of the idols, scourged, and banished, after making many converts. Again preaching in Emilia, he was seized and banished to Asia, from whence he passed into Thrace, and finally returned to Ravenna, where he was martyred. His feast is on the 23rd of July. A list of other bishops ordained by St. Peter is given by Father Oldoin, from ancient authorities; Stachys at Byzantium, Domnio at Salona, Amasian at Tarentum, Photinus at Beneventum, Saturninus at Toulouse, Rufus at Avignon, Altinus at Orleans, Anathelon at Milan, Aristobulus in Britain, and others in France and Italy, Corsica and Sardinia.

Between the second year of Nero and the tenth, Peter preached in the West, and, according to Simeon Metaphrastes, in Britain. It is out of the compass of this work to enter into questions that involve a large amount of research and learning, for it would swell into an ecclesiastical history; but this much seems certain, that the faith was preached in Britain, as in the rest of the world, in the time of the Apostles. There is also sufficient evidence that St. Joseph of Arimathea penetrated to the far west of the island, and founded the mother church of Glastonbury.

During his absence from Rome, Linus, ordained bishop of the city, and Cletus, of the suburban district, acted in St. Peter's stead. They seem, moreover, to have acted as coadjutors in attending to the wants of the Christians in Rome and the strangers who came there. Clement was Peter's assistant deacon, and seems to have been his favourite disciple. These three may be called the germ of the future cardinals.

St. Paul, born in the city of Giscala, of the tribe of Benjamin, upon the capture of his native town by the Romans, went with his mother to live at Tarsus, in Cilicia, from whence he came to Jerusalem, to study the law under Gamaliel. He took the name of Paul from Sergius Paulus, pro-consul of Cyprus, whom he converted. Returning to Jerusalem with Barnabas after his missionary labours, he was there elected and ordained apostle of the Gentiles by Peter, James, and John. In the second year of Nero, A.D. 58, he was sent prisoner to Rome with Aristarchus, his fellow-captive, and, as a Roman citizen, allowed some liberty in his captivity, disputing with the Jews, and detained a prisoner two years. At length, being liberated, he preached in the western world, and probably to its extremities, in Spain, Gaul, and Britain, as St. Peter is said to have done.

In the seventh year of Nero, James the Just, called the Brother of the Lord, was martyred by the Jews. Hegesippus, who lived shortly after the Apostolic age, says of him: "That he was a Nazarite, sanctified from his mother's womb, never tasting wine or flesh, or touched by razor, nor using bath or unguent, and was clothed in linen. He was allowed ingress into the Holy of Holies, and his knees were hardened like a camel's, by constant prayer." In the absence of Festus the governor, at his retirement from the province, to be succeeded by Albinus, Annas the high priest, the son of Anna, bid him deny Christ to be the Son of God, which when he refused, he ~~was~~ sentenced to be stoned to death. He was placed upon a pinnacle or balcony of the Temple, to be heard by the populace, when, instead of abjuring, he proclaimed the faith, and was thrown down. Being still alive, and lifting up his hands to pray for his persecutors, he was struck by a fuller's club, and expired. Josephus says of him that the repute of his sanctity was so great, that it was commonly thought that on account of his unjust death Jerusalem was destroyed. It was to James that Our Lord is said to have appeared after His resurrection, to comfort him after His passion, since which he had eaten no food, and taking bread, blessed it and broke, saying, "Eat thy bread, My brother, because the Son of Man is risen from the dead." He was Bishop of Jerusalem to the year 63, the seventh of Nero, and his sepulchre was to be seen on the spot where he fell when thrown from the Temple until the time of Hadrian.

Barnabas of Cyprus also died by martyrdom before St. Peter. Elected with St. Paul apostle of the Gentiles, he wrote an epistle, which is not admitted to the canon of Scripture. Separating from Paul on account of the disciple Mark, whom he took with him to Cyprus, he died there preaching the faith and crowned with martyrdom.

About the tenth year of Nero, St. Peter returned to Rome, to comfort the Christians in their dreadful persecution. Nero is said to have set fire to the city in a mad freak, to witness the conflagration as exhibiting the burning of Troy, and at the same time with the intent of destroying the old and tortuous narrow streets of Rome. Out of the whole fourteen regions of the city, seven were completely destroyed and three others partially. The conflagration is said to have continued nine days. Accusation was made against the Christians of having fired the city, and they were apprehended in numbers. Some were wrapped in beasts' skins and baited with dogs; others clothed in garments smeared with pitch, to be slowly burnt alive, and serve as torches by night. Few men have exceeded Nero in cruelty and wanton wickedness. He sought victims not only among Christians, but in all men of note, and of these were Seneca, his own preceptor, and Lucan the poet. He murdered his own mother Agrippina, and his wife Octavia. His luxury was so great, that he bathed in liquid odoriferous unguents, and fished with nets of woven gold. He built magnificent public baths, and a palace called the Golden House, the galleries of which extended three miles. The first great persecution raised by him began the series of battles with the Church, in which the armies of hell endeavoured to extinguish the light of Christianity. The great anti-Christian monster was lashed into paroxysms of fury from time to time in defence of the old seat of iniquity in which he had reigned, and his rage fell upon the Popes, the successors of Peter.

In the twelfth year of Nero, not long before he suffered, Peter wrote his second Epistle to the Churches from this Babylon. He knew that his death was drawing near, and he predicted the destruction of Jerusalem, which in a brief time was to ensue. His contest with Simon Magus occurred at this time. That arch-impostor and apostate had wandered with his companion, Selene, to the world's city of corruption, and, competing with Peter in power of performing miracles, made a dead boy move by magic arts, but could not raise him to life. Peter resuscitated him in the Name of Jesus. Simon then challenged Peter to fly in the air from the Capitoline Mount to the Aventine in the sight of the people. At Peter's prayer the magician fell in his flight, broke his leg, and being carried by his satellites to Aricia, there died of vexation.

By this circumstance, or by the splendour of his sanctity and the veneration in which he was held, Peter awakened the notice and jealousy of Nero. He was seized, together with St. Paul, who had come to Rome in the same perilous time of persecution. According to the general tradition, Peter was thrown into the Mamertine prison, where he baptised the gaoler and was liberated by him, or, as others say, before he was taken, by the counsel of the Christians he departed from Rome by the Capenian Gate, and, as Hegesippus, Ambrose, and Gregory relate, Christ appeared to him as if on His way to Rome. Peter said, "Domine, quo vadis? Lord, whither goest Thou?" And the Lord said, "I go to Rome again to be crucified." Then Peter knew that his time was come, and the manner of his death according to Christ's prophecy, and returned to Rome to die. He had chosen Clement as his successor, to whom he committed the care of the Church in his stead, taking him by the hand and saying, "I give thee the same power of binding and loosing which Christ gave to me : despising all things of the world and the flesh, by prayer and preaching attend as a good pastor to the salvation of men."

Peter, condemned to a servile death, was crucified, and, at his own request, with his head downwards, as he said he was unworthy to be crucified in the same manner as his Lord and master, Jesus Christ. The place of his martyrdom was that summit of the Janiculum which is called from it the Golden or Montorio. Clement, with his disciples, Marcellus and Apuleius, received his body and buried it at the gardens of Nero on the Vatican, by the temple of Apollo. St. Paul, sentenced as a Roman citizen to be beheaded, was martyred on the same day on the Ostian road, and was buried there. It is superfluous, in the face of the consent of antiquity and all tradition, to raise the modern question of St. Peter having been at Rome. As Caius says, writing against Proculus: "I can point out to you the tokens of the victory of the two Apostles, for if you go upon the royal road which leads to the Vatican, or upon the Ostian road, you will find the trophies of the two who most certainly founded this Church of Rome—Peter and Paul."

Nicephorus gives the personal appearance of St. Peter. He was rather tall and of a slender make ; his face pale, and his complexion remarkably fair ; his hair and beard were short, crisp, and curly ; his eyes dark and bloodshot with much weeping ; his nose of moderate length, not aquiline, but slightly turned up. The same author describes St. Paul, and is confirmed by St. John Chrysostom and Lucian. He was small in stature, which he made still less by an habitual stoop in his carriage ; his face fair, his head small, and he appeared rather older than his years ; his eyes were remarkably beautiful in expression ; his eyebrows arched, his nose rather long, delicate, and aquiline ; his beard very long and full. This description agrees with the traditional likenesses, and those depicted on the glass plates or patens found in the catacombs.

The bodies of the Apostles lay undisturbed until some emissaries from the East attempted to carry them off. In this they so far succeeded as to convey them out of the city ; but being suddenly overtaken and terrified by a storm of thunder and lightning, they cast the bodies into a cemetery on the Appian Way, called from thence "ad Catacumbas." From this again they were removed after a lapse of time, as some authors say, by St. Cornelius, or, according to others, by St. Silvester, who at least more accurately divided the relics, giving the larger bones to St. Peter and the lesser to St. Paul, and replaced them respectively in the Vatican and on the Ostian road. St. Peter held the Pontificate in Rome twenty-four years, five months, and eleven days, in round numbers, twenty-five years. If we add to these the seven years at Antioch, the years of Peter may be reckoned as thirty-two.

Nero did not long survive the death of the Apostles. Condemned by the public voice to be dragged through the streets under the fork, and scourged to death, and his body to be thrown into the Tiber, he fled in fear to a suburban villa, where he put an end to his own life with a razor in his thirty-second year. The great persecutors for the most part died in a fearful manner, as a warning to all men, like Antiochus Epiphanes, Herod the Great, and Herod Agrippa.

CHAPTER II.

ST. LINUS, ST. CLETUS, ST. CLEMENT.

SECOND PERSECUTION UNDER DOMITIAN.

A.D. 69.—Romulus and Remus, suckled by a wolf, founded Rome in blood—a brother slain by a brother's hand. St. Peter and Paul founded the Christian Church, and inaugurated the reign of Christ on earth, in love and amity, giving their lives for Him and the salvation of men. Although Clement, by appointment of Peter, had the right of succession, he gave an example of unambitious modesty by yielding the place to Linus, the co-adjutor of St. Peter in the city. By his refusal, he obliged Linus and Cletus to be Popes before him.

Accordingly Linus, a Tuscan of the town of Volaterra, the son of Herculanius, succeeded Peter, and was Pontiff from the last year of Nero to the time of Vespasian, from the consulate of Scipio and Saturninus, to the consulate of Capito and Ruffus. Linus, says Father Oldoin, came to Rome for the sake of study at the age of twenty-two, and lived in the house of Fabius, his father's friend. He left all to follow St. Peter, and was sent by him on a mission to Gaul, where he converted the tribune Onasius, and founded a church in honour of the protomartyr

Stephen. He is said to have founded also St. Stephano in Rotondo, in Rome. Ordained bishop by St. Peter, he acted as his vicar. He is mentioned by St. Paul in his Second Epistle to Timothy, "Linus and Eubulus, etc., salute you."

In the time of Linus, Jerusalem was destroyed. According to Josephus, a million of Jews were either slain or otherwise perished in the city, or were led into captivity and sold, being gathered from all parts of the world to keep the Pasch. Thus they received retribution for the death of Christ their king, whom they slew at the time of the Passover, being collected there as into a vast prison, to suffer the death of malefactors, and great numbers were crucified. Linus baptised Nazarius, the son of Africanus and Perpetua, who went into Cisalpine Gaul, and was Apostle of Piedmont. He was accompanied by the boy Celsus, who endured with him many torments, from which they were delivered by miracle. Preaching the faith at Milan, they suffered martyrdom in that city, and were buried outside of the Roman gate, where their bodies were afterwards discovered by St. Ambrose, and translated with honour.

In the fifth year of Linus, St. Bartholomew suffered in Armenia, flayed alive; and in the seventh, St. Thomas transfixed by a Brahmin's spear in India, at Calamina.

The empire was convulsed after the death of Nero. Three emperors followed in quick succession. Galba, an old commander coming from Spain, was soon murdered by the Prætorian Guard for refusing a donative, and his headless corpse trodden down in the Forum. Otho perished by his own hand in desperation upon news of the defeat of his legions by Vitellius. The German army, led down into Italy by Vitellius, at the cost of sanguinary battles, in one of which forty thousand were left dead upon the field, made him master of Rome for a brief time, in spite of the Prætorian Guard. He feasted for a little while, and then, dragged from a vile hiding-place in the palace, was beaten to death by the populace, and his huge body cast into the Tiber, upon the news of the approach of the legions of Vespasian from the East.

Linus wrote the Acts of the Martyrdom of SS. Peter and Paul, and the Contest of St. Peter with Simon Magus ; but how far these are genuine as they exist is doubtful. He added the "Communicantes" to the Liturgy, and commanded women to veil their heads in the church. He was powerful in chasing demons from the bodies of the possessed, and raised even the dead to life. He was condemned to death by the consul, Saturninus, whose daughter he had delivered from the devil. Besides Nazarius and Celsus, Martialis, the apostle of Gaul, Processus and Martinianus, and many others, were martyrs in his time. He twice held ordinations, creating eleven bishops and eighteen priests, and after a pontificate of ten, or, as some say, eleven years, was buried in the Vatican beside St. Peter, on the 23rd of September, A.D. 79 or 80.

A.D. 80.—Cletus, a Roman, the son of Æmilian, of the Patrician quarter, was obliged to fill the chair of Peter against his will, Clement again refusing it. He was esteemed by others most worthy of the dignity for holiness and wisdom, but in his own eyes he deemed himself unworthy. He was Pope during the empire of Vespasian and Titus to the times of Domitian; from the seventh consulate of Vespasian and fifth of Domitian, to the consulship of Domitian and Ruffus, as Pope Damasus records.

After the taking of Jerusalem, Titus and Vespasian triumphed, riding in the same chariot, and Domitian followed on a white horse. The Arch of Titus remains, showing the tables of the law and the seven-branched candlestick borne in the procession. Vespasian was a merciful and clement emperor, and was a good prince, except for his love of gathering money, in which, however, he exacted nothing unjustly. He expended the money he collected in completing the Temple of Peace in the Forum, and beginning the Colosseum or Flavian Amphitheatre. His son, Titus, was as gentle in peace as he was brave in war, and so liberal, that he refused no man's request, saying that the face of the prince should send every man glad away. He counted the day lost in which he had done no man a favour. When he finished building his public baths, and the great Amphitheatre, he displayed his magnificence by a show or hunt of five thousand wild beasts. He was called the darling of mankind, but the mean and ill-favoured countenances of Vespasian and Titus, as seen upon their coins, display features hardly in keeping with the extravagant eulogies of their flatterers.

In the first year of Cletus, A.D. 80, the fearful eruption of Vesuvius burst forth which buried Herculaneum and Pompeii. The air was filled with ashes, which were carried by the wind to the coasts of Africa and Syria, and darkened the heavens at Rome. We have by this circumstance preserved to us many ocular testimonies of the refinement, luxury, and domestic habits of heathen life. Their method of taking the bath, and their shows of gladiators, with their various manner of combat in those cruel exhibitions, are represented on the walls of the exhumed houses of Pompeii. Some idea is also given of the elegance of their musical entertainments and theatricals.

In the Pontificate of Cletus, St. Luke the Evangelist died a martyr in Greece at the age of eighty-three. St. Gregory of Nazianzen speaks of his martyrdom, and Nicephorus says that he was crucified on an olive tree. His body was translated afterwards to Constantinople with the relics of St. Andrew, in the time of Constantius. About the same period St. Philip, after twenty years' preaching in Russia, where he planted the faith, returned to Asia, and died a martyr at Hierapolis, in Phrygia. By some he is called the Apostle, by others Philip the Deacon.

The second great persecution began under Domitian. This cruel emperor soon caused the happy memory of Vespasian and Titus to be forgotten. He was so wantonly cruel, that he went by the name of a second Nero, and he claimed honours as a god. Cletus was martyred, and in the same year, A.D. 92, Baronius places the living martyrdom of St. John the Evangelist, who was sent by the proconsul of Asia a prisoner on the charge of impiety to Rome, and put, by command of Domitian, into a caldron of boiling oil, from which he came forth more vigorous. Many martyrs suffered at this time, amongst whom was Flavia Domitilla, niece of the consul Clement. She was first banished to an isle of Pontus for the confession of the faith, and afterwards burned in her house. Nereus and Achilleus suffered with her. The priest Nicomedes, who had buried the martyred virgin Felicula, was beaten to death with loaded whips, and buried on the Nomentan Way near the walls. St. Timothy and Titus also suffered under Domitian, and the family of David was commanded to be sought for and exterminated.

Cletus ordained twenty-five priests, and held the Pontificate twelve years. He was buried near the body of St. Peter, on the 26th of April, A.D. 92.

A.D. 92.—After an interval of twenty days, Clement was enthroned in the chair of Peter, to which, as has been said above, he had a right of succession by the appointment of Peter himself; but he chose to yield to Linus and Cletus, the coadjutor bishops of the apostle. That Clement was the fourth Bishop of Rome is plain from the words of St. Jerome: "Linus was the second, Cletus the third, Clement the fourth Bishop of Rome." He was by birth a Roman, the son of Faustinus, of the region of the Cœlian Mount, an early convert of St. Peter and a faithful companion of the apostle. He may also be the same who is spoken of by St. Paul as his coadjutor in his letter to the Philippians, and of whom it is said that his name is written in the book of life. But some say that this is another Clement. He was ordained by St. Peter, first as his assistant deacon, and afterwards as bishop.

Clement was a great saint and a great Pope. He translated the Epistle of St. Paul to the Hebrews into Greek, and when Pope he wrote a letter to the Corinthians, fragments of which have been preserved, to put an end to a schism. It is written with authority in the name of the Church of Rome, and is the first instance of the paternal care of the See of Peter over all the Churches after the Epistle of St. Peter himself. In style it resembles St. Paul, which makes it more probable that he was a companion of that apostle as well as St. Peter, and styled by him his coadjutor. It is quoted by Justin Martyr, St. Basil, and St. Athanasius, and, as Eusebius affirms, was read in the early churches. A second epistle is also attributed to him, and other letters, two of which are to the Bishop of Jerusalem, in one of which he says, "When Simon Peter knew that the end of his life drew high, having assembled the brethren in a council, he took me by the hand and said, 'I appoint this companion of mine, who was from the first ever faithful to me since I came to Rome, the bishop of this city.'"

If this passage be genuine—and with little doubt it records a fact—it could not have been written to St. James, Bishop of Jerusalem by Clement as Pope, for St. James died before St. Peter. It might have been to his successor, who was also a relative of Our Lord. According to Eusebius, he wrote the disputation between Peter and Appion, and his eight books of Apostolical Constitutions were revered by antiquity, being reckoned by the Abyssinians among the canonical Scriptures. His memoirs of St. Peter have been falsified, as he himself says in one of his Epistles.

The evangelist St. John was still living in Clement's time, and, exiled to the Isle of Patmos by Domitian, saw and wrote the visions of the Apocalypse. When Domitian died, in the midst of his persecution of the Church, murdered in his palace, in the fifteenth year of his empire, his acts were rescinded by Nerva, and St. John returned to Ephesus, where he survived to the time of Trajan, dying at the age of ninety-three, according to Baronius, A.D. 101. By some it is believed that his body was assumed into heaven, and that there are no relics of it.

Nerva was chosen emperor when past seventy years of age, and reigned only one year and four months. He was a just and clement prince, annulling the persecuting laws, so that many Christians returned from exile and recovered their goods. He was succeeded by Trajan, his adopted son, surnamed Crinitus; or the long-haired, a Spaniard renowned for his moderation, courteous manners, and military glory. He greatly extended the empire, bringing the Germans beyond the Rhine to peace with the Romans, subjugating the Dacians and other nations north of the Danube; he made new provinces on the Euphrates and Tigris, conquering and holding Armenia, Assyria, Mesopotamia, Ctesiphon, and Babylon, pushed the confines of the empire to India, and built a fleet upon the Erythræan Sea to carry his arms to the coasts of the far East. Still, with all his noble qualities, wise, generous, and prudent, with many great gifts, he was a heathen, and a persecutor of the faith.

Clement, by his venerable sanctity and august character, was making many converts to the faith, amongst whom Sisinnius, a familiar friend of Nerva, had received baptism, when he was accused before Trajan by P. Tarquinius, custodian of the religious rites, and Mamertinus, prefect of the city. He was sentenced to be banished to the Tauric Chersonese, now the Crimea. Deported thither, he found two thousand Christians condemned to labour in the marble quarries. Such was the common fate of the early Christian confessors ; and, in later times, to add to the barbarity of their treatment, the sinews of one foot were cauterized, to ensure their captivity and enhance their sufferings. These living martyrs were in want of water, which they had to bring from a distance of six miles. Clement prayed, and beheld a lamb standing on a hill, from whose right foot striking the ground a miraculous spring arose, with which they were supplied. The Pope, by his preaching and miracles, converted a number of the neighbouring population, and in consequence emissaries were sent to put him to death. He was flung into the sea with an anchor attached to his neck. A chapel is said to have been formed by angels' hands, in which the body was found when the sea ebbed, which annually became accessible on his festival. His martyrdom took place on the 23rd of November, in the third year of Trajan.

Clement sent Gratian, Ursinus, and Saturninus into Gaul, and ordained Eugenius Bishop of Toulouse. He decreed many things with regard to the sacred vestments and the ornaments of bishops and archbishops; he added to the liturgy, and put the canon in a more exact form; he appointed notaries, one for each of the seven regions of the city—which, as before mentioned, remained out of the fourteen after the conflagration—to record the acts of the martyrs; he held ordinations in the month of December, which was then the one appointed time, in which he created fifteen bishops, ten priests, and two deacons. He was Pope for nine years and two months.

The mention of these ordinations held by the Popes leads to the subject of the clergy of Rome and the cardinals. The word means the principal or head clergy, and their origin is co-existent with the Papacy. It was necessary for the Head of the Church to have coadjutors in a work of such vast extent. Such were Linus, Cletus, Clement, Anacletus, and Mark, even in the time of St. Peter; Linus and Cletus were his bishops, Clement and Anacletus his deacons. The seven deacons were appointed to attend to the seven regions, and, of course, were important persons of the clergy. The “titles” were churches where the Sacraments were administered, and where incomes were provided or houses attached by the gift of pious benefactors, as that of Pastor or St. Pudentiana, and afterwards of Lucina, Eudoxia, Emiliana, and the rest. To these were appointed cardinal or principal clergy, sometimes more than one over each ; as, for example, to the title of Julius there were three. Pope Evaristus is said to have divided the parishes more exactly, and after him Hyginus. The titles were increased under St. Silvester, when the donations to the churches had increased in number and value. The numbers accordingly varied ; Cletus ordained twenty-five priests, and the most ancient titles were twenty-eight. The cardinals in after times numbered seventy, and Platina says that once, in Paschal II.'s time, there were ninety. It is well to mention this once for all, as the ordinations held by each Pope are always noted, and this is not without its significance.

After the death of Clement, the See was vacant twenty-two days.

CHAPTER III.

ST. ANACLETUS, ST. EVARISTUS, ST. ALEXANDER.

THIRD PERSECUTION UNDER TRAJAN.

A.D. 100.—Anacletus, an Athenian, the son of Antiochus, ordained deacon by St. Peter, succeeded Clement, and was Pope from the second year of Trajan to the eleventh, in the third great persecution. About the time of his accession St. John the Evangelist died. Anacletus has been by some confounded with Cletus, the third Pope; but Cletus was a Roman, Anacletus an Athenian. He made a memorial to his father, Antiochus, and, legislating for the Church, decreed that no prelate or clerk should wear a beard or long hair, that holy orders should be given publicly, and that a bishop should be ordained by three consecrating bishops, a custom established by St. Peter. He also ordained that all present at Mass should communicate or retire. He added the “Dominus vobiscum” and “Pax vobis,” though these forms are of more ancient and Eastern origin. He is said also to have written some decretal letters.

Numerous martyrdoms took place in his Pontificate. The most celebrated was that of the great Bishop of Antioch, St. Ignatius. The second Bishop of Antioch was Evodius, ordained by St. Peter, and Ignatius the third, or, as some say, the coadjutor of Evodius, ordained by St. Paul bishop of the Gentiles. He was put in chains, to be sent prisoner to Rome, and ten satellites, or guards, were chained to him, whom he calls ten leopards. On his way he wrote epistles to the churches, which contain admirable matter and ardent aspirations for martyrdom. He begs the Christians not to pray that the beasts may spare him. "I know," he says, "what is good for me. Come fire, come the cross, come the breaking of my bones, and the wild beasts, that I may find Jesus Christ! Welcome the crushing of my whole body, and all the torments of the devil, if only I may win Christ! May the teeth of the lions grind me to meal, that I may be made pure bread of sacrifice!" He suffered with the same constancy, rejoicing when he heard the roaring of the beasts of prey, by whom he was torn in pieces, and only a portion of his bones remained. These were gathered up and carried to Antioch, where they were laid outside of the Daphnian Gate, and afterwards brought to Rome. The ancient record of his martyrdom calls them more precious than gold, and says they were visited yearly by the faithful with great devotion.

St. Simeon, the son of Cleophas, the cousin of Our Lord, the aged Bishop of Jerusalem, suffered in this persecution, being a hundred and twenty years old, so that it is said men marvelled to see the constancy with which a man of so great age endured a lingering death by crucifixion.

Pliny the younger, governor of a province, moved to pity by the numbers of Christian martyrs, writes to Trajan, "that multitudes are daily put to death in whom there is no other crime than that they meet together before dawn of day to sing hymns, and that adultery and such other things are forbidden among them." Trajan wrote in reply, "That Christians were not to be hunted out, but if accused, to be punished."

Anacletus assigned sepulchres for the martyrs separate from others. He adorned the sepulchre of St. Peter with a chapel or memorial, as far as could be done with secrecy in such times of persecution. He held one ordination in the month of December, in which he created six bishops, five priests, and three deacons. He was martyred in the eleventh year of Trajan, having sat in the chair of Peter nine years and two months. The See was vacant for thirteen days.

A.D. 110.—Evaristus, the son of Juda, a Bethlemite, succeeded Anacletus. In his time Trajan died of dysentery at Seleucia, in Isauria, having been emperor for eighteen years. He was much lamented by the people, and his body was embalmed and brought to Rome, where it was laid under his beautiful spiral pillar, which is a hundred and forty feet high, adorned with representations in relief of his wars and victories, to be seen in the Foro Traiano. He was munificent in works for the public good, in building bridges over rivers and making roads, and he made the seaport at Ancona. To the deserving he was bountiful in rewards, and so renowned for hospitality, that he was thought to exceed in this. But notwithstanding, the persecution continued to rage in many provincial towns. The history of Faustinus and Jovita, brothers, noblemen of Brescia, recorded on the 15th of January, shows how violent it was in this emperor's time. They were thrown into prison at Brescia, exposed to wild beasts, and put to many torments ; then dragged in chains to Milan, where they were again tormented, and from thence sent to Rome as obstinate Christians, where they were comforted and consoled by Pope Evaristus. From Rome they were sent to Naples, and there bound hand and foot and flung into the sea. Preserved miraculously from death, they were sent back to Brescia, and martyred on the accession of Hadrian.

The romantic story of St. Eustace and his family is another instance. He had served Trajan as commander in the Dacian wars, and became a Christian in his residence at Tivoli, being converted by a miracle. A stag brought to bay bore a crucifix between its horns, and a voice addressed him, bidding him to receive baptism and prepare for great sufferings for the faith. He was sentenced to banishment, and the slaves revolted on his estate. Taking passage from Ostia with his wife and children, he was turned adrift on the coast of Africa with his two little sons, the captain of the vessel detaining their mother whom he sold for a slave. In crossing a river, he was robbed of his sons by a lion and a bear. After fifteen years, he was sought for by Trajan, and found labouring on a farm. Restored to his command, he recovered his wife and his lost children, who were brought to his notice by their distinguished valour in battle. They suffered martyrdom at Rome for refusing to sacrifice to the gods, in the brazen bull, at the accession of Hadrian.

History is silent on topics so disagreeable, and England's Elizabeth is praised while the martyred priests and confessors of the faith are ignored or traduced. Heathen writers say nothing of Christian malefactors led through the towns of Italy, and Japanese historians will recount as little of the Catholic martyrs led round and exhibited in the cities of Japan. Of Trajan it was usual to say at the installation of emperors down to the time of Justinian, 'May you be more fortunate than Augustus, more excellent than Trajan.'

Evaristus appointed priests to the several titles in the city. Each title or endowed church had a veil or tabernacle where the Holy Eucharist was reserved. The veil was ornamented with a cross, and, as some suppose, was the origin of the word ciborium, which is thought to be a corruption of siphorium, or the curtain, still retained by the Greeks. It seems to have represented the mystery of the Holy Eucharist, Christ veiled under the Blessed Sacrament, and the priest going within the veil to have typified the Ascension of the Lord, veiled by a cloud, from the eyes of the beholders. Evaristus also appointed that the seven deacons should assist the Pope when he preached. He decreed that laymen should not accuse a bishop. Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, wrote in his time—a disciple of the priest John, a learned man, whose doctrine was followed by Tertullian and Irenæus; but it seems he is not to be confounded with St. John the Apostle. Pope Evaristus held three ordinations, and created five bishops of various sees, six priests, and two deacons. He was martyred on the accession of Hadrian, and was buried in the chapel over the tomb of St. Peter, built by Anacletus. He was Pope for nearly ten years. The See was vacant nineteen days.

A.D. 121.—Alexander, the son of Alexander, a Roman of the region Caput Tauri, succeeded to the Pontificate. He was young in years, according to some only twenty, though others say thirty, but was ripe in wisdom, and a great Pope. He is said to have studied under Plutarch and Pliny.

It was an age in which there was an affectation of learning. Ælius Hadrian, the emperor, was learned in both languages, Greek and Latin, and took pleasure in the company of Plutarch and other men of letters. He collected a library at Athens, which he ornamented with buildings, and restored the bridge over the Cephisus. Initiated in the Eleusinian mysteries, he was reputed a favourer of the false gods, and gave occasion to a fanatical outbreak of persecution. But as a philosopher he was, or affected to be, open to remonstrance, and he read an apology for Christianity, presented to him by the bishop Quadratus. Aristides, a Christian scholar, who wore a philosopher's gown, also presented him with a similar work, which induced him to soften in some degree the severities against the Christians, and he wrote to Minucius Fundanus, proconsul of Africa, not to put them to death unless they were proved guilty of some crime. At Rome Hadrian built the bridge over the Tiber called by his name, and the Mole of Hadrian for his mausoleum, now called the Castle of St. Angelo. In Britain he made a wall between Solway and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, eighty miles in length, to keep back the Picts and Scots from their incursions. Being a traveller throughout the world, and an admirer of art, he built at an enormous expense his curious villa at Tivoli, containing in its vast circuit imitations of many famous buildings and places, with a miniature Vale of Tempe. He was also a legislator; but if we would form a true idea of Hadrian as an idolater, we must turn to the acts of St. Symphorosa's martyrdom. On occasion of the solemn dedication of his villa at Tivoli he inquired of the gods by sacrifice. The oracle replied that the gods were tormented by Symphorosa and her sons. That noble lady was summoned before the emperor, and commanded to do sacrifice. She replied: "My husband Getulius and his brother Amantius, your tribunes, emperor, preferred to die, beheaded by your command." Angered at her reply, Hadrian bade her be beaten with fists in the face, then she was hung up by her long hair, and finally flung into the river with a stone about her neck. Her seven sons were hauled aloft by pulleys upon seven platforms, round the temple of Hercules. The throat of the eldest, Crescentius, was cut open, the breast of Julian split asunder, Nemesus was pierced in the heart, Primitivus in the stomach, Justinus in the loins, the sides of Stacteus were ripped open, and Eugenius, the youngest, divided asunder from head to foot—doubtless, as Röhrbacher observes, in accordance with superstitious rules of magical art. Such a scene, suited to the idolatrous savages of Mexico, needs no comment, but it tells the horrors of heathen worship.

The youthful and learned Pope made many converts among the Roman nobility. Amongst these was Hermes, prefect of the city, with his wife Theodora, and all his household. St. Sabina, a noble Roman lady, suffered martyrdom, and with her St. Sapphira of Antioch. Alexander was accused, taken, and brought before the judge Aurelian. He was racked, torn with hooks, and perforated with sharp instruments, and finally beheaded, with Eventius, his priest, and Theodulus, his deacon. He suffered on the 3rd of May, A.D. 131 or 132.

Pope Alexander added the words in the Mass which precede the Consecration—" Qui pridie quam pateretur"—in memory of Christ's Passion. He commanded holy water, blessed with prayers and mixed with salt, to be kept in churches and private houses to drive away demons, and decreed that water should be mixed with the wine at Mass, and that altar breads should be made of unleavened bread ; but it is not probable that these things were first done by him, but were usages from Apostolic time. In his time the heretic Basilides was confuted by Agrippa, and joining Bar Cochebas, the false prophet of the Jews, in his insurrection, perished in it. To punish the Jews for this rebellion, in which they had been cruel to the Christians, Hadrian forbade them to enter Jerusalem, which he rebuilt and called after his own name—Ælia. He allowed the Christians to dwell there, and Mark, the first Gentile bishop of Jerusalem, was chosen at that time.

Alexander took refuge in the Catacombs. It is the first mention of these as a hiding-place, and it is evident, from their nature, that they could not have afforded an asylum for many refugees, or that this was the service for which these extraordinary excavations were intended. They were begun and gradually extended for the purposes of Christian burial, and only at times served for the concealment of the more noted victims of persecution, and especially of the Popes. The tomb of Alexander has been discovered in modern researches, which have verified dates and wonderfully confirmed the places of sepulture, and the names of martyrs given in the ancient Martyrologies. The Catacombs are a running comment on the truth of the acts of the martyrs. They are a visible proof opened to us after a lapse of ages, fresh and intact, of the faith, the sacraments, and the worship of the early Christians, and still more of the multitudes who suffered in the persecutions.

St. Jerome attests, in his comments on Ezekiel, that the Catacombs were devoutly visited in the fourth century. In the two following centuries, Celestine I. and John I. adorned with paintings the cemeteries of St. Priscilla, and of St. Nereus and Achilleus. After the inroad of the barbarians, John VII., Gregory III., and Paul I. made some restorations, and recommended these holy places to the veneration of the faithful. In the twelfth century they are mentioned by Peter Mallius, and in the thirteenth as among the "Marvels of the City of Rome." During the absence of the Popes at Avignon they were forgotten. In the time of Sixtus V. attention was called to them by that great Pope. Panvini, and then Bosio, the Oratorian, followed by Aringhi and Boldetti, opened and successively explored this mine of Christian antiquity. Their volumes, filled with illustrations, have fortunately preserved most interesting pictures, now to be no longer seen. Father Marchi and the Chevalier Rossi have continued the work.

The Catacombs may be described as a library in corridors, on whose shelves are deposited as a record the bones of the saintly dead. Except a portion on the Janiculum, they run round the environs of Rome. That on the Janiculum is the most ancient, where St. Peter was entombed. The next is that of Processus and Martinian, the gaolers of the Mamertine, on the Aurelian road. The cemetery of Priscilla is also of an early age, the opening of which, in the time of Baronius, created much admiration, in which the body of St. Pudentiana was laid beside her father on the Salarian road. The family of Pudens consisted of Priscilla, his wife ; Pudens, his son ; and his children, Timothy and Novatus, Pudentiana and Praxedes. The bodies of St. Pudentiana and Praxedes, with the vases of blood—which they collected with care—of other martyred saints as related in their acts, were found in the time of Paschal I. The short inscriptions of "sweet soul," "dearly beloved," "innocent soul," "most faithful servant of God," and others similar, so often repeated in the Catacombs, with the unmistakable emblems of the dove with the olive branch, the fish, the anchor, and the palm, suffice to show that these sepultures are Christian. The figures of the stag, the lamp, and the bunch of grapes are less clearly intelligible, unless they are interpreted by the deep mystical symbolism which is so frequent in the Catacombs. The early Christians were imbued with the love of parables, or figures representative of some secret meaning. The language of the martyrs was often couched in such expressions. "Now is the time of vintage," said St. Eugenia, "when the good grapes are gathered to be pressed." It is the language of the Holy Spirit, by which the ancient histories of the Old Testament become intelligible through the New. Moses striking the rock, giving the living water; Jonas rising from the mouth of death, represented by the whale; Noah looking forth from the ark to receive the olive bough; Daniel among the lions, are emblems continually repeated, figuring Christ in His life, death, or resurrection. Sometimes He is the Good Shepherd, or again is forgiving sins, raising the paralytic or the dead to life. Again there is the fish bearing the chalice, or bread touched by a wand to represent the Holy Eucharist. These are but a few examples of pictures in the Catacombs, which, in the language of an old poet, "are speaking to the wise." Even Orpheus with his lute, charming the seven beasts, is brought in to typify the power of Divine grace upon the soul.

The cemetery on the Appian Way, named afterwards from St. Callixtus, existed in the second century, and in it a vast number of martyrs were buried. The bodies successively laid there are numbered at sixty-four thousand, and near to it, on this road, is the pit especially named "Ad Catacumbas," where the bodies of St. Peter and Paul lay for a considerable time, according to the tradition recounted above, and endorsed by St. Gregory, when in the very first age the oriental Christians endeavoured furtively to remove the bodies of the Apostles, whom they claimed as their compatriots, and, frightened by a storm, laid them in this resting-place, which is probably the origin of the word. In the catacomb upon the Appian Way, Pope Urban was concealed when Cecilia sent Valerian to find him.

Father Oldoin relates that Alexander, when put in chains by the judge Aurelian, was miraculously delivered, and, to the astonishment of Aurelian, appeared unfettered before him; also that he was thrown into the fire, from which he came forth unhurt. He held three ordinations in December, creating five bishops, five priests, and three deacons. He was buried at the seventh milestone on the Nomentan Way, where he suffered, having been Pope ten years. The See was then vacant for twenty-five days.

CHAPTER IV.

ST. SIXTUS, ST. TELESOPHOS, ST. HYGINUS, ST. PIUS, ST. ANICETUS, ST. SOTER.

FOURTH PERSECUTION UNDER THE ANTONINES.

A.D. 132.—Sixtus, the son of Pastor, a Roman of the region Via Lata, succeeded Alexander. At the close of his time Hadrian died, leaving a little poetical melancholy effusion addressed to his parting soul: "O my poor soul, whither art thou going, fleeting and wandering into regions dark and unknown, where thou wilt have thy pleasures no more." He died of a dropsy, or cutaneous disease, in the twenty-second year of his empire, and was succeeded by Antoninus, surnamed the Pious, a native of Cisalpine Gaul.

Pope Sixtus decreed that the holy vessels should not be touched except by those in sacred Orders, and that corporals should be made of the finest linen; also that bishops visiting Rome should take back with them letters commendatory from the Pope, to show to their people that they were approved by him, or that their cause referred to Rome was decided in their favour. Sixtus added to the Mass the "Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus" to be sung at the Preface. For the Mass was at first brief. St.

Peter, when he consecrated, in addition to the form of consecration, used the Lord's Prayer. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, increased the number and the length of the prayers, and afterwards St. Basil. SS. Linus, Clement, and Alexander, as noted above, added to the canon of the Mass, and put it in more exact form. Celestine afterwards added the Introit; St. Gregory the Kyrie and Gradual; Telesphorus, or Stephen, the Gloria; Gelasius, the Collects. The Epistle and Gospel, if not usual before, were added by Damasus and St. Jerome. The Alleluia was taken from the Church of Jerusalem. The Nicene Creed from or after the Council. Pelagius formulated the Commemoration of the Dead, which was of Apostolic usage; Innocent, the Pax; Sergius, the Agnus Dei. The Confession before the Mass is attributed to Damasus.

Gaul, destitute of bishops, sent to the Pope to petition for aid, and Peregrinus, a Roman, a legate commissioned by Sixtus, having preached the faith, was martyred. The frequent martyrdoms at this time in Gaul are said to have caused this paucity of pastors.

Sixtus held three ordinations in the usual month of December, and created four bishops, eleven priests, and eleven deacons. He suffered martyrdom, according to the Roman Martyrology, under Antoninus Pius, on the 6th of April, A.D. 142, following the chronology of Baronius, and was buried by the tomb of St. Peter, on the Vatican, having been Pope for ten years, three months, and twenty-one days. The See was vacant only two days.

A.D. 142.—Telesphorus, of Thuria, in Calabria, was chosen the ninth Pope. His father became an anchorite, or hermit, or, as some say, Telesphorus himself was an anchorite, for this kind of life was followed in the earliest times of Christianity, and, indeed, before it, by Elias and St. John the Baptist, and the Essenians. At this time the Valentinian heresy arose. These heretics said that Christ took nothing from the substance of the Virgin Mary, but came through her as water passes through a conduit. Justin, the philosopher of the city of Neapolis, in Palestine, wrote against Marcion, who, following Cerdo, maintained that the two principles of mercy and justice in God were antagonistic, and that Christ was not the Son of the Creator Who made the world. He also answered Crescens, the cynic, whom he reproved as a glutton and a sensualist, and afraid to die, and refuted his blasphemies against Christ. Accused by him, he was brought to his death, and suffered martyrdom for the faith. He wrote an "Apology for Christianity," which he presented to the emperors, and a Dialogue with Trypho, the Jew.

The Emperor Antoninus Pius was a promoter of heathen worship and the ancient false religion. He joined his son-in-law Marcus Aurelius, and Lucius Verus with him, as partners in the empire. The character of zeal for religion in the so-called good emperors often fostered an increase of bigotry, and was the cause of more cruel persecution. Marcus Aurelius issued, as we read in Röhrbacher (vol. v. p. 120), the following decree :

"Aurelius, emperor, to all his administrators and officers,—We have heard that those who call themselves Christians, in these our days, transgress the laws. Apprehend them, and if they refuse to sacrifice to the gods, punish them with torments. Let justice be mingled with severity if on punishment they renounce their crime.”

This their crime and transgression of the laws is apparently their refusal to conform with the religion of the false gods. As an example of the decree above, St. Felicitas and her seven sons were summoned to be examined before Publius, the prefect of the city, and the process of their examination taken to Aurelius. They were sentenced to die by torments. The eldest of her sons was beaten to death by whips loaded with balls of lead; the second and third by blows with clubs or bludgeons; the fourth was precipitated headlong, and the three younger children were beheaded. The mother suffered the last.

Pope Telesphorus decreed the fast of the seven weeks of Lent, to be kept in common by all, which had been a traditional observance from Apostolic time, and had partially been neglected. Also that three Masses should be said on Christmas Day—the first at midnight, the second at dawn, the third at break of day. He is said to have added the Gloria in Excelsis to the Mass. He held four ordinations, and created thirteen bishops, fifteen priests, and eight deacons. He was apprehended as an enemy of religion by the false priests of the idols, and was martyred on the 5th of January, A.D. 152, after a Pontificate of eleven years, three months, and twenty-two days, and was buried near St. Peter, on the Vatican. The See was vacant seven days.

A.D. 152.—Hyginus, an Athenian, the son of a philosopher, was the tenth Pope, by whom the gradation of rank in the clergy was more accurately determined, and the parishes or districts of Rome divided under the titular or cardinal priests. To him are attributed decrees on the form of churches, and the consecration of altars with chrism, and on baptisteries; also that in baptism there should be a godfather and godmother, and that material for church building should not be applied to profane purposes, nor churches be enlarged or diminished without consent of the bishop; that no metropolitan should condemn a bishop without the consent of the bishops of his province—though this is attributed by some to Pope Pelagius.

The age of the Antonines has been much praised. Antoninus Pius was a liberal benefactor of the people, and assisted with large sums the rebuilding of houses devastated by an inundation of the Tiber. The ports of Terracina and Gaieta were rebuilt and beautified in his time, and a spiral pillar raised either by him or to his memory. In Britain he built the wall or trench which ran between the Firth of Forth and the Clyde; for, as Camden has shown, the wall of Hadrian was between the Solway and the Tyne; but in the time of Antoninus, the Scots were driven farther back, and the wall which had been begun by Agricola restored. The wall of Hadrian was again restored by Severus, and fortified with towers at a later period, with a tubular telephone from tower to tower to give signals. But notwithstanding his public benefits, as we have seen, Marcus Aurelius was a persecutor ; Lucius Verus Commodus, his associate in the empire, was an odious prince ; and Commodus, the son of Aurelius, equalled the worst of the preceding emperors in vileness of life and manners. His glory was to exhibit in the arena as a gladiator, or as a Hercules, whose name he assumed, killing beasts in the amphitheatre with a club. The persecution raged in the time of the Antonines, though it culminated in Commodus.

Melito, Bishop of Sardis, wrote a Christian Apology, which he presented to Marcus Aurelius. Tertullian highly praises this work, and calls him a prophet of the Christians. Theophilus of Antioch also wrote against Marcion, and against Hermogenes, who held the first matter to be God.

Hyginus wrote two Epistles, one of which was a general letter to the faithful. He was Pope four years, from the year 152 to 156. He is styled a martyr, and was buried near the body of St. Peter. He held three ordinations in December, and created six bishops, fifteen priests, and five deacons. The See was vacant four days.

A.D. 156.—Pius, the son of Ruffinus, a native of Aquileia, was the eleventh Pope. Lucius Verus died of apoplexy, and Marcus Aurelius became sole emperor. He was an admirer of philosophers, and placed the statue of Fronto, his master, in the senate-house. He was a warlike prince, and, accompanied by his son Commodus in his campaigns, conquered the Marcomanni, Quadi, and Sarmatians. Being in want of money to pay his troops, he sold by auction, in the Forum of Trajan, his furniture and his wife Faustina's jewels, and when he returned victorious, offered the price to the purchasers, though he did not oblige them to give up what they had bought. His liberality in this, and in rewarding his soldiers, as well as in remitting taxes and forgiving debts, publicly burning bonds for money due to the treasury, made this emperor so beloved by the people, that it was counted a sacrilege not to have his image in the house.

St. Pius consecrated the Church of St. Pudentiana at the request of St. Praxedes, in whose Acts it is mentioned that the Pope buried her father, Pudens the younger, and visited often her sick brother, Novatus. This church was consecrated under the title of Pastor, in her house, near the baths of Novatus, in the Patrician Street; a baptistery was made in it, and the whole of the household, ninety-six persons, according to the Roman Breviary, May 19th, there received baptism. Pope Pius often said Mass in this church, and adorned it with gifts. Hermas, the brother of the Pope, wrote his book, entitled "The Pastor," in the time of Pius. It contains revelations, similar to those of the Apocalypse, of great persecutions to ensue; also the command of an angel on the keeping of Easter on the Sunday. A decree to this effect was made by this Pope; also that no one obstinately adhering to the Jewish law should be baptised. He decreed, moreover, penance of forty days for negligence in letting the Sacred Blood fall upon the ground; of three days if it fell on the altar ; but if so as to stain the second cloth or linen, of nine days ; that the Sacred Blood should, if it were possible, be reverently received by the tongue ; but if not, that the spot on which it fell should be washed and scraped, and the purification be thrown into the sacrarium or burned.

In his time, Apollinaris, Bishop of Hierapolis, wrote an Apology, which he presented to Marcus Aurelius. He wrote also against the false prophetesses, Priscilla and Maximilla, the devotees of Montanus, the pretender to the effusion of the Holy Ghost. Tatian, a disciple of St. Justin, wrote at this time, at first well, and afterwards maintaining abstinence, which, carried to further excess by Severus, was called the heresy of the Encratites, against whom Musanus wrote. Philip, Bishop of Crete, wrote also against Cerdo and Marcion. Pope Pius is reckoned among the martyrs, and died on the 25th of June, A.D. 167, having been Pontiff eleven years, four months, and three days, and having held five ordinations, in which he created ten bishops, nineteen priests, and twenty-one deacons. The See was vacant for thirteen days.

A.D. 167.—Anicetus, the son of John, a Syrian, of the town Vicomurcus or Humisias, according to St. Damasus, succeeded St. Pius. It is the opinion of some that he preceded Pius, and there is confusion in the history of this period. Hegesippus, who wrote his “Ecclesiastical History” at this time, in a simple style, beginning from the Passion down to this age, says that he came to Rome in the time of Anicetus, the tenth after Peter (that is if Linus and Cletus are omitted), and that he remained to the time of Eleutherius, who at this period was deacon of Anicetus. Hegesippus declaims against the hero-worship of the heathen, and the honours paid to such men as Antinous, the favourite of Hadrian. Marcion came to Rome at this time, according to Irenæus, and St. Polycarp met him there. Being asked by Marcion if he knew him, "Yes," he replied, "I know you, the first-born of the devil." This holy bishop converted many of the sect of the Marcionites and Valentinians, and, returning to his bishopric of Smyrna, was burned alive, at the age of eighty. He heard a voice from Heaven encouraging him, and saying, "Polycarp, be a man!" He stood, it is said in his Acts, shining like a bright pillar in the flames, which arched over him, until he was pierced with a sword, and his blood gushing out quenched the fire; a sweet smell arose from the pyre.

Anicetus renewed the decree that no cleric should wear long hair; also the former decree that no bishop should be consecrated by less than three of episcopal dignity, which was afterwards made a canon of the Council of Nice. That all the bishops of the province should be present at the consecration of a metropolitan. That no bishop should prefer a charge against his metropolitan except to the primate or the Apostolic See, which was also confirmed at the Council of Nice, and by succeeding Popes. Moreover, that without a special title to it, metropolitans should not be styled patriarchs or primates, but archbishops.

Thus we find the Popes issuing decrees affecting the whole Church; such was the decree of Pope Pius with regard to Easter and the Jews, and the letter of St. Clement on the schism to the Corinthians. The decree of the keeping Easter on the Sunday was again enforced by Victor on the Eastern Church, as well as on the West, with a threat of excommunication, and was finally obeyed. St. Polycarp pleaded with Pius or Anicetus the custom of the East, and Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, was contumacious to Victor; but the authority of Peter prevailed.

Anicetus held five ordinations in the month of December, and created nine bishops, nineteen priests, and four deacons. He was martyred, and buried in the cemetery upon the Appian Way, afterwards called the Cemetery of Callixtus, where Alexander was also buried; and the fact seems to point out the violence of the persecution, and that he probably suffered martyrdom there. Authors vary in the number of the years of his Pontificate. He died on the 16th of May, A.D. (circiter) 175. The See was vacant seventeen days.

A.D. 175.—Soter, the son of Concordius, a native of Fundi, in Campania, succeeded St. Anicetus, as the thirteenth Pope. Commodus, the vile son of Aurelius and Faustina, was emperor, in whose time the miracle took place which gave the name to the Thundering Legion. In his letters to the senate, Commodus confessed that when his army was in want of water, rain fell at the prayers of the Christians, with lightning and thunder, which discomfited the Germans and Sarmatians, and that to this he owed the victory. On his return to Rome, he disgraced himself by his debaucheries, exhibited his feats as a gladiator, and put to death the noblest and best senators of Rome. He changed the name of Rome to Commodiana, and the names of the month of August to Commodus, of September to Hercules, and the rest to similar titles taken from the amphitheatre, which were abolished as soon as he was dead. He died strangled in the house of the Vestal virgins. To his crimes were attributed the burning of the library and temples on the Capitoline, which were set on fire by lightning. The Temple of Vesta, the palace, and a portion of the city, perished in the conflagration.

St. Soter wrote a decretal letter to the bishops of Italy, requiring a priest who celebrated Mass to be fasting, to have two persons at least present at celebration, and that those present, unless they were under some impediment, should communicate; that religious women should not be allowed to minister in putting incense into the thurible, or touching the pall or corporal.* He also appointed that marriages should be celebrated with due solemnity before a priest, and not clandestinely, with the approval of parents, and in the presence of bridesmaids; though by some this is ascribed to Evaristus.

* In the Breviary, the Communion of all present at Mass is said to have been decreed by St. Soter with regard to the Mass in "Cænâ Domini," and therefore probably only means to enforce the present usage of the clergy present at that Mass. The present practice of the Church is the safest comment on all matters of ritual in ancient times, Eusebius writes that Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth, disciple of St. Paul, was living in Soter's time, of such eloquence and learning, that his Epistles were read in the churches. Thedotion, a disciple of Tatian, wrote against the heretic Apelles, who maintained that Christ was only apparently man, not really. This heresy was called that of the Phantasiasts. Clement of Alexandria, the master of Origen, composed philosophical works and a book against the Gentiles. Pinytus of Crete was a man of letters, Oppian a poet, and Herodian a grammarian.

It would be interesting to pursue the question how far the schools of philosophy which flourished at Athens and Alexandria contributed to promote or impede Christianity. All profound study without doubt assists and verifies true religion, while a shallow philosophy accompanies and gives birth to error. Plato shows how ridiculous were the pretensions of the Sophists in his day, and how rare a thing it is in the world to find many, or even a few, capable of grasping scientific truth. It is easy to affect the philosopher's gown, but difficult to understand profoundly and clearly the study of the human mind. Hence the Stoics, the Cynics, the new Platonists, and the would-be philosophers are found among the opponents of Christianity, and a few clever apostates like Porphyrius. Apologists for its truth have been mentioned among the philosophers, such as Justin Martyr, Quadratus Bishop of Athens, and others. The greatest intellects in the world have been both Christians and philosophers.

St. Soter held five ordinations in December, and created eleven bishops, eight priests, and nine deacons. The length of his Pontificate is given by Damasus as nine years; by others, as much less. He died a martyr, April 22nd, A.D. (circiter) 182, and was buried in the cemetery of Callixtus, on the Appian Way. The See was vacant one day.

CHAPTER V.

ST. ELEUTHERIUS, ST. VICTOR, ST. ZEPHYRINUS,
ST. CALLIXTUS.

FIFTH PERSECUTION UNDER SEVERUS.

A.D. 182.—The fourteenth Pope was Eleutherius, a Greek of the city of Nicopolis, in Epirus. Letters came to him soon after his election from the martyrs in prison at Lyons, by the hands of Irenæus, the arch-priest, relating their sufferings. Photinus, the aged bishop, bore the kicks and beating of the populace at ninety years of age, and Attalus the red-hot chair, and Blandina was tossed by the bull in the amphitheatre. This, with the burning of St. Polycarp, may be called the episode of the persecution of the Antonines. But in the Pontificate of Eleutherius, excepting this furious outburst in Gaul, the Church had rest and Christianity made progress. At Rome many noble families received and acknowledged the faith. The convert Apollonius, a public orator, suffered death for the faith, for making an oration in praise of Christianity, a thing forbidden by law under pain of death. About the beginning of this Pontificate, Lucius, the son of Coel, a British king, sent two messengers to Rome—Elvan and Medvan, or Medwin—to obtain from the Pope missioners to instruct his people in Christianity. Fugatius, or Faganus, and Damianus, or Divianus, Roman priests of learning and dignity, were sent as legates. By them the king and his household were instructed and received the faith, and it is said that instead of the three arch-flamens—so they are called by Ptolemy—three archbishops were appointed at London, Caerleon, and York, with ten bishops in each of their provinces.

It has been objected to this—though the fact is recorded by St. Bede—that the title of a king of Britain is absurd. But, as Alford shows, the line of British kings existed under the Romans, and they maintained their rank in many instances as tributaries, nor was this unusual in the Roman empire. Coel, in particular, the father of Lucius, or Lever Mawr—which means the “great light”—was in favour with the Roman authorities, having served under Titus and Vespasian with the rank of tribune. It is therefore more probable that he would be left in possession of his hereditary right of leader of the British princes, as son of Marius. Christianity had long found a home in Britain before the time of Lucius, and the two messengers to Rome are said to have been Christian cœnobites; nor is the reception of Christianity and destruction of the Druidical superstition in Britain at this time so improbable as it may seem at first sight. There was a line of bishops of London from Theanus, in the time of Lucius, to Theonus, or Theonius, the last who was expelled or martyred by the Saxons when they became masters of the island. The authenticity of the letter of the Pope to Lucius may not bear criticism, but that in the time of Eleutherius, Britain, by his authority, and by commission of learned Roman priests—who in after times would be called cardinal legates—received a hierarchy as a Christian country, cannot be well disputed.

St. Eleutherius decreed against the Encratites that no one should refuse any kind of usual food on account of superstition ; that accusations should not be received against the absent ; that no one should be degraded from his rank in the Church, unless convicted of some crime, after the example of Christ, who bore with Judas as an apostle until he openly prevaricated.

Various sects sprang up out of the heresy of the Marcionites. Some maintained one principle as the cause of sin and evil as well as of good ; others two, antagonistic to each other, and some three principles with three natures, and rejected the ancient prophets. Florinus and Blasco held that God was the author of sin, against whom the Quolitians contended that God was not the author or creator of evil. Modestus wrote against the Marcionites, and Bardesanes, who had been a Valentinian, against the Valentinians. St. Jerome praises him, saying that “ If he was so excellent a writer in Greek, what must he have been in his native Syriac ? ” Galen, the great physician, whose life was a long one, and extended over a considerable period, is placed by some at this time.

After the death of Commodus, Pertinax, prefect of the city, was chosen by the senate, and made emperor, against his will, at the age of seventy. He refused the title of Augusta for his wife and of Cæsar for his son, to show that the imperial dignity was forced upon him. Pertinax was niggardly in his habits, and soon incurred the hatred of the rapacious Prætorian Guard, by whom the empire was put up to the highest bidder, and bought by Didius Julianus, a lawyer, at the price of an immense donative or largess to the soldiers, and Pertinax was murdered by them in his palace.

Eleutherius held three ordinations in December, in which he created fifteen bishops, twelve priests, and eight deacons. He died on the 26th of May, after a Pontificate of thirteen years, or, according to Baronius, of fifteen, and was buried in the Vatican, by the sepulchre of St. Peter. He is styled a martyr, though it is not certain that he died by violence, for this title is given to those who endured persecution for the confession of the faith. The See was vacant five days.

A.D. 195.—Victor, the son of Felix, an African, succeeded Eleutherius, and was the fifteenth Pope. He is reckoned by St. Jerome among the ecclesiastical writers, and it may be observed that at this time three conspicuous figures of the age were Africans. Severus was emperor, an African of the town of Leptis; Tertullian, the great controversialist, was an African, the son of a centurion of Carthage; and Victor was Pope.

Didius Julianus was put to death by Severus, after an empire of seven months. Severus was a stern soldier, and cashiered the Prætorian Guard for the murder of Pertinax. He conquered Pescennius Niger, his opponent in the East, and as victor of the Parthians, Adiabeniensians, and Arabs, is inscribed on his triumphal arch beneath the capitol, Parthicus, Arabicus, Adiabenicus. He made Central Arabia a Roman province, and in Rome built the baths of Severus between the Palatine and Cælian. Nor was he unacquainted with letters, but was studious of philosophy. According to Tertullian, he was not unfavourable to Christians until he was urged to persecute by the cruelty of Plautianus Lateranus, his father-in-law, and at his instigation the fifth violent persecution began under Severus.

In the fifth year of Pope Victor and the fourth of Severus, the controversy which had been moved in the time of Pope Pius on the celebration of Easter, revived. The Asiatic bishops were accustomed to end the fast of Lent and begin Easter-time on the fourteenth day of the moon in March, after the vernal equinox, on whatever day of the week it fell. This custom was not universal in the East, and in the West the custom was to keep Easter on the Sunday next after the fourteenth day of the moon, by Apostolical tradition. Pope Pius, and, according to Damasus, Pope Eleutherius, had passed a decree that the Apostolical tradition should be observed, and that Easter should not be kept at the same time with the Jewish Pasch. Victor, summoning a council of bishops—one of whom, Theophilus of Cesarea, was a skilful mathematician—passed a decree to the effect of keeping Easter on the Sunday, and drew up a Paschal Cycle for the observance of it.

Polycrates, the Bishop of Ephesus, refused obedience to this decree, maintaining the Asiatic custom, saying that he followed the authority of the ancients and of the Apostle St. John. "We," he said, "keep the very day on which it fell, neither adding nor diminishing; this opinion St. Philip followed, who died at Hierapolis, and St. John, who leaned upon the bosom of the Lord. . . . Polycarp and Thraseas, Melito and Narcissus, Bishop of Jerusalem, did the same." Councils held at Cesarea by Theophilus, in Gaul by Irenæus, in Corinth by Bacchylus, in Pontus, Tyre, and Jerusalem, received the decree and assented to it; but Polycrates remained obstinate, with a number of Asiatic bishops. The Pope insisted, and would have excommunicated them, but was persuaded by St. Irenæus to relax. Afterwards the decree of Victor was made a canon of the Council of Nice. Victor also decreed that baptism should be generally given at Easter-time, but in case of necessity at any time, and that then common water could be used. Also he forbid the accusation of bishops without manifest evidence, and that their causes should be referred to the Apostolic See.

This learned and energetic Pope excommunicated Theodotus of Byzantium, the tanner of Corinth, who denied the Divinity of Christ, and Praxeas, the Patripassian. In his time Appion wrote his Hexaameron, and Sextus on the Resurrection. Arabianus wrote a summary of Christian doctrine, and Judas a history of Christianity down to the tenth year of Severus, in which he held an erroneous opinion of the immediate coming of Antichrist, because it appeared to him that the cruelty and wickedness of the world had reached such a pitch, that God could endure it no longer. St. Victor is styled a martyr, and was buried near St. Peter on the Vatican on the 26th of July. He was Pope for ten years and three months. The See was vacant twelve days.

A.D. 205.—Zephyrinus, a Roman, the son of Abundius, succeeded Victor and was the sixteenth Pope. In the second year of his Pontificate the persecution began to rage in the East in which Leonides, the father of Origen, was martyred. St. Perpetua and Felicitas suffered in Africa, and their history is one of the most beautiful of the touching acts of the martyrs. The vision of St. Perpetua, in which she saw a ladder to heaven, beneath which lay an ugly monster, on whose head she first set her foot, and then scaled the stairs with ease, illustrates the painful sacrifices in private life which must have so frequently accompanied martyrdom. This previous conflict signified in the vision was the encounter with the tears and reproaches of her aged heathen father, who besought her not to load her family with disgrace, and bring down his grey hairs with sorrow to the grave. St. Martina in Rome was an example of heroic protracted endurance, and her martyrdom, signalised by stupendous miracles, is kept on the 30th of January. Revocatus, Saturninus, Pam-machius, Calepodius, and Quirinus, are some of the names of suffering saints in this persecution ; and at Lyons, St. Irenæus closed a holy life with a martyr's death.

Pope Zephyrinus decreed that priests and deacons should be ordained publicly in the presence of clergy and laity, which was afterwards confirmed in the Council of Chalcedon. Also that the Precious Blood should not be consecrated in wooden chalices, but in glass or crystal. Glass was afterwards forbidden as liable to be broken, and brass or bronze, on account of the taste ; gold, silver, and tin were only allowed to be used. The decree is also attributed to him of the injunction of Easter Communion on all Christians past the age of childhood, to which Innocent III. added confession of sins. Also that the presbytery should assist at the bishop's Mass, which had been already decreed by Evaristus.

In the time of Zephyrinus, Heraclitus wrote commentaries on St. Paul, and Candidus composed his Hexaameron, while the celebrated Origen, after the martyrdom of his father, kept a grammar school to support his widowed mother and her six children. After this he gave himself wholly to religious teaching and preaching, and had disciples martyrs. The heroic Potamiena, led by his precept and example, endured martyrdom by boiling pitch poured upon her head. He went barefoot in practice of consummate poverty, and his abstinence was excessive. He knew all languages and was versed in all kinds of literature, but this wonderful man, by his act of indiscretion in mutilating himself, has left a blot upon his character, and his treatise on "First Principles" has given rise to heresies.

Tertullian was more unfortunate. His stern asceticism led him into heresy and fanaticism, and his intolerant spirit to impiety and scoffing at the Pope. A great head is more dangerous than a great heart, and while we lament the fall of Tertullian, the generosity of Origen enlists our sympathy to hope that his reputed errors have been exaggerated and his speculations misunderstood.

The Pontificate of Zephyrinus, according to Baronius and others, was a long one. Severus died at York broken-hearted at the parricidal attempts of Caracalla, his murderous son, who tried to kill his father, and, it is said, slew his brother Geta in his mother's arms. This monster succeeded to the empire, and, taking the name of Antoninus, completed the Baths called the Antonine and paved the Via Nova. It is to be remarked that the great public baths, which were such a boon to the people and built with such luxurious magnificence, were the works of the worst of the emperors in the most persecuting times, and their stones were cemented with the sweat and blood of Christians condemned to slavery. The baths and the amphitheatres fed the two favourite sins of the populace of Rome—lust and the love of bloodshed. Caracalla died, assassinated between Carræ and Edessa, and was succeeded by a boy born at Emesa, reputed to be a son of Caracalla, but by his mother's side of the royal Phœnician race of the Priests of the Sun. Macrinus, who had been chosen by his soldiers to succeed Caracalla, was soon after slain at Chalcedon, and Heliogabalus, the boy priest, entered Rome leading the Chariot of the Sun. He appointed his mother and the women of his court to hold the senate, and amused himself with blowing up with inflated bellows suddenly expanded, the guests as they were seated at his table. He exhibited in the amphitheatre a hunt of ten thousand mice by a thousand weasels. He was flung into the Tiber with his mother by the Prætorian Guard, after a disgraceful empire of three years, and was succeeded by Diadumenus and Albinus, and then by Alexander.

In the second year of Heliogabalus, Pope Zephyrinus died, as some suppose, a martyr for refusing to sacrifice to the Sun, and was buried "ad Catacumbas," near the Cemetery of Callixtus on the Appian Way. The catacomb in which he was laid is named from him the Cemetery of Zephyrinus, as it was excavated by him. He held four ordinations in December, and created thirteen bishops, thirteen priests, and seven deacons. St. Damasus gives him only eight years, but Baronius and others eighteen, of Pontificate. His memory is kept on the 26th of August. The See was vacant six days.

A.D. 221.—St. Callixtus, the son of Domitius, a Roman, succeeded Zephyrinus, a holy and great Pope, whose reputation was slandered by a Novatian heretic. He had been chained as a slave to work in the mines of Elva, and a calumny on this account, which was indeed an honour, and for the misuse of ecclesiastical revenues, was raised against him. He worked miracles, curing Privatus, a leper, and Blanda, a paralytic. An energumen seized by the devil cried out on the Capitol, "The God of Callixtus is the one true God." An ancient author of the Lives of the Popes writes that he built the church of the Blessed Virgin Sta. Maria in Trastevere, which was the first public place of worship in Rome, and the site was obtained by a rescript of the Emperor Alexander, against the suit of some tavern-keepers who wished to build cook-shops on the locality. It was the spot from which the fountain of oil flowed into the Tiber at the time of the Nativity. It is recorded by St. Damasus and Lampridius that Callixtus built it, but whether it was the present ample structure may be doubted. The expenses of the suit and the building may have given rise to the accusation against the Pope of the misuse of funds by the anonymous author of a libel entitled the "Philosophumena," whose calumnies contributed to bring the Pontiff to a cruel martyrdom.

Callixtus decreed the fasts of the Quatuor tempora in which ordinations could be held, hitherto usual in the month of December only. Also that the accusations of infamous persons should not be received against the clergy. He condemned the doctrine that a cleric who had fallen, and done canonical penance, could not be restored to his dignity, for the severe dogmas of Novatus began to be prevalent. Tertullian had given a handle in Africa to the error of the second baptism of heretics in the time of Pope Zephyrinus, and now wrote his rigid treatises on fasting, chastity, and marriage but once allowable. His school had been frequented by St. Cyprian, who, as related by St. Jerome, never failed to attend his lectures daily.

Origen wrote about this time his books against the Ebionites, the Valentinians, and the apostate infidel Porphyrius. That acute opponent of Christianity allows him to be the prince of philosophers, and St. Jerome says that his books amounted to six thousand volumes. Alexander, the young emperor who soon succeeded Heliogabalus, was a youth of sixteen, and his mother Mammea sent for Origen from Antioch to come to Rome and instruct her in the Christian religion. Alexander himself is said by some to have been a Christian, but this seems more than doubtful. He was rather a hero-worshipper than a Christian, and had an image of Christ, Abraham, and Orpheus among his domestic gods. It is said that he thought of building a temple to Christ, and he was imbued with many Christian sentiments which were learned perhaps from his mother. One of his sayings was, "Do to others as you would be done by;" and this he had put up as an inscription in the Forum. His tutor or preceptor was Ulpian the lawyer, an enemy of orthodox Christians, to whom the government of Rome was committed in the absence of Alexander, and he continued the persecution.

Pope Callixtus was accused before Ulpian, and, as it seems, calumniated by the heretics. He was cast into prison, deprived of food, daily beaten with rods, then flung from a window to the ground and finally precipitated into a well. He was the seventeenth Pope, and held five ordinations in the month of December, creating eight bishops, sixteen priests, and four deacons. He was buried in the Cemetery of Calepodius, on the Aurelian Way, on the 14th of October. This cemetery had been made or adorned by St. Callixtus to receive the body of the martyr Calepodius drawn out of the Tiber, and he himself was laid there. The great Cemetery of St. Callixtus is named after him on the Appian Way because it was repaired or beautified by him, or probably greatly extended by the excavators in his time. He was Pope for six years and ten months. The well into which he was thrown is in the church of Sta. Maria in Trastevere. After his death the See was vacant six days.

CHAPTER VI.

ST. URBAN, ST. PONTIAN, ST. ANTHERUS, ST. FABIAN.

SIXTH PERSECUTION UNDER MAXIMUS.

A.D. 227.—St. Urban, a Roman, the son of Pontian, was the eighteenth Pope. According to an ancient document he was seven times accused before the judges; and during the whole of his Pontificate was in trouble and persecution. He took refuge in the Catacombs on the Appian Way. There he baptised Valerian and Tiburtius, sent to him by St. Cecilia. They were converted by the sight of the Angel who attended her. She died in her father's house, which, at her request, was dedicated as a church, having endured first the fire of the hypocaust or bath heated to the full, and afterwards remaining three days alive with her head half severed by the stroke of the soldier sent to despatch her, from which he desisted after inflicting three blows with the axe. Urban made many converts, and amongst them Maximus, the chamberlain of the emperor. He made a decree that property given in alms to the Church should be equally divided among the clergy. He commanded plate, for the use of the altar, to be of silver.

Minutius Felix, a Roman pleader of celebrity, wrote in his time a dialogue between a Christian and a heathen. In this we have recorded the horrible accusations commonly made and received among the heathen against the Christians. Such, for instance, as the worship of an ass's head, the murdering of a child, which was covered with dough or paste, and then eaten; the meeting together in subterranean darkened rooms where the lights were extinguished and every wickedness practised, and other tales too shameful or revolting to be mentioned, forged or imagined at the suggestion of the devil to prevent converts from joining the faith or to cause persecution. Some of these charges originated from the crimes of heretics, and some seem to have been actually alleged by them against Catholics. Minutius Felix also wrote against diviners and astrologers. Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, collected a famous library, and Trypho attended the school of Origen.

After a Pontificate of four, or as some say of six years, St. Urban was accused before Ulpian, and condemned. He suffered martyrdom, and was buried in the Cemetery of Prætextatus on the Tiburtine Way. The body was afterwards removed by Pope Paschal to the church of St. Cecilia, when the touching discovery of her remains was made in rebuilding her church in the Trastevere. Urban held ordinations in December, in which he created nine bishops, nine priests, and five deacons. The See was vacant for thirty days.

for the faith or success in promoting it, awakened the fury of the priests of the false gods—by whom he was accused to Alexander, or more probably to Ulpian. Alexander was often absent from Rome, and fought with success against the Persians or Parthians in the East. He seems at this time to have been with his army in the West, for he was soon afterwards slain in a mutiny of his soldiers at Mayence on the Rhine. He was a disciplinarian, and had disbanded some whole legions for misconduct. He seems to have been indifferent to the fate of the Popes, or left the whole matter to Ulpian, by whom Callixtus, as we have seen, was cruelly martyred, Urban condemned, and Pontian, with his attendant priests Philip and Hippolytus, was banished to Sardinia. There he was kept prisoner, watched by soldiers, to the time of Maximin, by whose command he is said to have been beaten to death with clubs. Whatever may have been the faults of Alexander, he was an accomplished prince, and, with the assistance of Julius Frontinus and Ulpian the lawyer, endeavoured to amend the state of Rome politically, to restrain the excesses of the soldiery, and promote taste for the fine arts. His sins against religion were soon thrown into the shade by Maximin.

The emperors, in proportion to their wickedness, and sometimes to their profession of philosophy, were enemies of Christianity, and especially of the Popes. We now come to some hideous characters who, in accordance with their brutality, endeavoured with the fury of a wild beast to stamp out the Papacy. Of this Maximin, who now appears upon the stage, was a perfect specimen. He was born in Thrace, famous for its athletes, of a Getan or Gothic father and an Alan mother, and was first a herdsman and then a soldier. In stature he exceeded eight feet, drank an amphora at a meal, and consumed, it is said, forty pounds of meat a day. His feet were so large as to become a proverb, and he used his wife's armlet for a ring to his finger. He was chosen emperor by the soldiers without the authority of the senate, and was a fitting character to carry out the unrelenting persecution of the Christians, which he continued during the three years of his reign. Learning was his abomination, and he sought out for destruction the most learned and the best. St. Pontian, according to some, was by his command beaten to death with clubs; others say that he died from the hard treatment he received in his place of exile and death in Sardinia, where his body lay for three years, and was afterwards removed to Rome by Pope Fabian with much solemnity, and buried on the Appian Way near the Cemetery of Callixtus, in the catacomb which took his name. He held two ordinations in the month of December, creating six bishops, six priests, and five deacons, and was Pope for five years. His memory is kept on the 19th of November. The See was vacant for ten days.

A.D. 238.—Antherus the son of Romulus, a Calabrian, was chosen to succeed St. Pontian. According to some authors he was a Calaritan of the Isle of Sardinia, where he was elected Pope, and immediately proceeded to Rome, to console the Christians suffering under the persecution of Maximin. He was careful in commanding the notaries to take down accounts of the acts of the martyrs in the seven regions of the city, an office which had been instituted by St. Clement, and was continued by St. Fabian, the successor of Antherus, who appointed seven sub-deacons to preside over it. The persecution was very violent, and the new Pope was soon taken and brought before Sabinus, the prefect of the city, by Vitalian, the captain of the Prætorian Guard. He was tortured and then beheaded on the 7th of January, so that some give him only one month and a few days of Pontificate ; but according to others he was Pope part of two years, and wrote a decretal letter to the bishops of Spain that "No bishop should be translated from his See for pecuniary advantage, but for the good of the flock committed to him, with the consent of the Apostolic See." This decree, dated in July, would prove, says Father Oldoin, that he was Pope for more than a year. He held only one ordination in December at Fundi in Campania on his way to Rome, in which he created one bishop. He was the twentieth Pope, and was buried in the Cemetery of Callixtus on the Appian Way.

A.D. 240.—For thirteen days the clergy and their persecuted flock hesitated whom to choose. A white dove descended upon Fabian, and he was elected Pope. Fabian the son of Fabius, a noble Roman of the region of the Cœlian Mount, the twenty-first Pope, was diligent in collecting the acts of the martyrs by notaries ; he repaired and beautified the cemeteries, and decreed that the holy chrism should be every year consecrated on Maundy Thursday, and the remainder of the last year's chrism be consumed by fire. Also that it should be composed of balsam mingled with oil. He affirmed that the solemn consecration of it in Cœna Domini is of Apostolical tradition.

Maximin besieging Aquileia was slain in his tent by his soldiers, together with his son. The senate declared him an enemy of the Roman people, and the persecutors of the Christians, Sabinus, prefect of the city, and Vitalian, prefect of the Prætorian Guard, were both put to death. Gordian was made emperor; the sixth great persecution ended, and there was a respite for a time. Gordian, victorious over the Parthians, was assassinated by Philip, an Arab chief, and by this crime Philip and his son Philip succeeded to the empire. They were Christians, or, as some say, were converted by St. Fabian, who subjected the emperor to canonical penance for his sin before he admitted him to the sacraments.

When the new emperors came to Rome from the East, a thousand years were completed since the foundation of the city, and the secular games, celebrated every hundred years, were kept with extraordinary magnificence. It was a new epoch, inaugurated by the first promise of the dawn which was to break upon the world in another half century, and a beginning of the change which was coming on the great city when it would pass from its pagan deities to become the centre of the Catholic Church, no longer oppressed and persecuted, but reigning under its head, the Vicar of Christ, dominant over converted nations to the end of time. Rome is linked with the Papacy, and the Papacy with Rome. The See is the bride of Peter until the world falls. But the time had not yet come for the freedom of the Church ; seas of blood were yet to be shed before its deliverance from pagan thralldom.

In the fifth year of his empire, though some give him seven years, and the second after the celebration of the anniversary of a thousand years of Rome, Philip the father was murdered at Verona by the arts of Decius, and his son Philip at Rome. The hatred of Christianity increased in virulence ; and as Maximin had sought the death of Mammea and her preceptor Origen, so Decius, following in his steps, sought the death of Christians as adherents of Philip, and by cutting off the principal men who professed it, resolved to exterminate the faith.

In the five or seven comparatively peaceful years of the time of Philip, St. Fabian adorned the tombs of the martyrs in the cemeteries, and held a council at Rome against Novatian the heretic, who denied that those who had once fallen from the faith could be restored. Sixty bishops were assembled, and this false doctrine was condemned, and it was declared that no one was incapable of the pardon of his sins. Origen sent his profession of faith to the Pope, excusing himself of the charge of heresy, and wrote a letter of instruction or advice to Philip the emperor and his wife Severa. He confuted the heresy that the soul dies or sleeps with the body until the time of the resurrection, and then is resuscitated with it ; and the heresy of the Helcesites who rejected St.

Paul, and maintained that it was no sin to deny Christ in torments if the faith was retained in the mind.

He wrote also against Celsus, and it is said of this indefatigable man that he kept seven writers employed while he dictated to them. In Africa St. Cyprian, a noble senator and rhetorician, converted to the faith by Cœcilius, took his name. The patriarch of Jerusalem, the aged Narcissus, by his urgent entreaty compelled Alexander, Bishop of Cappadocia, who came to visit the holy places, to take upon him the administration of the patriarchate, which he fulfilled, until he was taken to Cesarea to suffer martyrdom in the persecution of Decius, when the great martyr, St. Babylas, suffered also at Antioch.

St. Fabian held the Pontificate thirteen or fifteen years, according as the time of Pope Antherus is reckoned at two years or a month. He was taken and put to death at the accession of Decius, and many of the principal clergy were seized and put in prison, among whom were Moses and Maximus, priests, and Nicostratus, deacon, to whom St. Cyprian wrote in their captivity while the See was vacant.

It remained vacant for the unexampled space of a year according to Ciaconius, for the number of the clergy of Rome was so diminished or dispersed that they abstained from electing a Pontiff. St. Fabian held five ordinations, in which he created eleven bishops, twenty-two priests, and seven deacons. His feast is kept on the 20th of January with that of St. Sebastian, but according to an ancient martyrology he suffered on the 20th of March. He was buried in the cemetery of St. Callixtus on the Appian Way; but according to Ferrari a portion of his relics—his head and arm—were venerated at the catacomb of St. Sebastian.

CHAPTER VII.

ST. CORNELIUS, ST. LUCIUS, ST. STEPHEN, ST. SIXTUS II.

SEVENTH PERSECUTION UNDER DECIUS.

EIGHTH PERSECUTION UNDER VALERIAN.

A.D. 254.—Cornelius, a Roman of that same noble family, the son of Castinus, was chosen Pope in the place of St. Fabian, and destined to almost certain martyrdom. Decius pretended to reform the abuses under the reign of the Philips, and to put down the Christians as their abettors, and subverters of the imperial majesty of Rome. He was a native of Buda in Hungary, and was declared emperor by the soldiers in Pannonia, over whom he was appointed by Philip. He created his son Decius Etruscus, Cæsar, and as soon as he came to Rome published a bloody edict against the Christians, which he sent into all the provinces, commanding the magistrates to search for them and employ every torment to bring them to submission. The seventh great persecution began with an array of all instruments of torture : fire, the sword, the rack, hooks for tearing the flesh, red-hot plates and bars, and the beasts of the amphitheatre. The saints suffered in great number both in Rome and the provinces. Tryphon and Respicius the tribune were beaten to death with loaded whips after other torments, the feet of Tryphon being transfixd with red-hot nails ; a virgin named Nympha suffered with them. Abdon and Sennen, Persians, accused of burying the bodies of martyred Christians, brought in chains to Rome by command of Decius, were thrown to lions and bears, and when the beasts refused to touch them were beheaded. In Sicily the prætor Quintianus cruelly cut off the breasts of the virgin St. Agatha, who was miraculously cured of her wounds by St. Peter appearing to her in prison, and then suffered martyrdom. At Camerino the boy Venantius, fifteen years of age, endured with sweetness a long conflict. His mouth was beaten in and jaws broken, and he was suspended head downwards over a fire, then thrown to lions who licked his feet, flung from a precipice, and dragged through thorns and briars until the soldiers were weary. Kneeling upon a stone which, as if softer than his persecutors, retained the impression of his knees, he prayed for his murderers, and gave them drink in their thirst by a miraculous spring. Many converts were made by his constancy and miracles, who were beheaded with him. In Alexandria there was a general panic, and St. Apollonia, whose teeth were first struck out, threw herself of her own accord into the flames. At Carthage many fell away for fear. At Antioch St. Babylas died in his prison. St. Paul, the first hermit during the rage of this persecution, retired at the age of fifteen into the desert of the Thebais, and dwelling in a cave clothed in matting of palm leaves, lived a solitary to the age of a hundred and ten, down to the time of Constantine.

In the midst of this persecution, St. Cornelius, a holy priest of the Roman Church, who had regularly ascended the usual degrees of ordination, was elected Pope against his will. St. Cyprian, who received information of the regular and canonical election of Cornelius, has left a record in his letter to Antonianus of the method of a pope's election. By Apostolic usage, some sign was looked for as indicating the person to be chosen. After this the cardinal clergy of the Church of Rome, were assembled and their votes taken one by one. If any foreign bishops were present at the time in Rome, their votes were taken also. Sixteen bishops were present at the election of Cornelius, two of whom, Stephen and Pompeius, were delegates from Africa. From them St. Cyprian had information of the truth which the heresiarch Novatian endeavoured to falsify. The attempt of Novatian to set himself up against Cornelius is the first example of an Antipapal schism. Supported by Novatus from Africa, he obtained some votes of the clergy and of some bishops in Italy to dispute the election of Cornelius, whom he accused of laxity in admitting the lapsed to repentance.

The Emperor Decius was summoned to the frontier to repel the Scythians of the Tanais, and there was betrayed by Gallus, being led into a swamp where he was swallowed up together with his horse, and his body was never found. Gallus succeeded him with his son Volusian. The Christians considered the death of Decius a judgment of God, and there was some little respite from persecution. But the newly-elected Pope was informed against, it seems by the Novatian heretics, and ordered to go into banishment from Rome to Centum Cellæ, now Civita Vecchia, and there neither to write nor receive letters. It is said by some that before he left Rome he removed the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul from the cemetery "ad Catacumbas," where they had been thrown in the attempt to carry them to the East, as they were considered no longer safe in that locality, and that he placed the body of St. Paul on the Ostian Way near the spot of his martyrdom, and the body of St. Peter at Montorio. This is said to have been at the request of the lady Lucina, afterwards conspicuous in her services to the Popes ; but though she lived long and was nineteen years a widow after her husband's death, she was probably too young at this time, and the removal of the bodies was perhaps made at a later period.

St. Cyprian wrote letters to Cornelius at Centum Cellæ, and Cornelius replied. Information was given to the emperor, and the Pope was summoned to Rome, and according to the acts, brought before the presence of Volusian, who thus addressed him :

"Are you so obstinate a traitor as to condemn the divinities and disobey your emperor by writing and receiving treasonable letters ?"

To which the Pope replied :

"It is no treason to write and receive letters which do not concern the state, but are wholly on spiritual matters and the praises of Christ."

Enraged at this reply, the emperor commanded him to be beaten with loaded whips weighted with balls of lead, and taken to the Temple of Mars to adore his statue. Cornelius, refusing to adore, was beheaded, having first recommended the care of the treasures of the Church to the archdeacon Stephen. He was martyred on the 16th of September, on the same day but not in the same year as St. Cyprian, who suffered several years afterwards. Twenty martyrs were put to death with him, one of whom was Cerealis, a soldier whose wife Sallustia the Pope cured, by a miracle, of paralysis, and converted, and she suffered at the same time. The martyrdom of Cornelius is recorded by St. Damasus. He held the Pontificate two years or part of three, and created, according to some, in two ordinations held in December seven bishops, four priests, and four deacons. According to others he held no ordinations on account of persecution. The lady Lucina is said to have obtained possession of the body of the Pope by night, and of the martyrs who suffered with him; and, accompanied by the clergy and attendants, to have buried them in her estate near the Cemetery of Callixtus on the Appian Way. The discovery of his sepulchre in modern times on that spot, is given in Dr. Northcote's interesting book on the Catacombs. The See was vacant after his death for a month and five days.

St. Cornelius held a council in Rome, at which sixty bishops were present and a greater number of priests and deacons, in which he condemned the cruel doctrine of the Novatians, and confirmed the decrees of the first council of Carthage, held by St. Cyprian on the reception of the fallen to penitence.

A.D. 255.—Lucius the son of Porphyrius, a priest of Rome who had been companion of Cornelius in exile, was elected to succeed him, and was almost immediately ordered into banishment, upon which St. Cyprian wrote to congratulate him on the double honour of being pontiff and confessor. His exile was not long, and again St. Cyprian wrote to wish him joy on his return. The cause of this permission to return was the death of Gallus and Volusian, slain by their own soldiers as they marched against Emilian, the leader of the Pannonian legions; and he, after a short reign of three months, was put to death, and Valerian, the commander of the German legions, declared emperor with his son Licinius Gallienus, whom the senate created Cæsar.

The Tiber overflowed its banks and inundated the city. A fearful pestilence raged throughout the world, leaving neither province nor people and scarcely a family untouched. The nations of the north began to threaten and hang like a thundercloud on the horizon. Valerian at first seemed mild and favourable, but became for three years and a half a most dreadful persecutor, so as to be thought the true Antichrist, until he met with a fearful retribution, taken captive in Persia.

St. Lucius, the twenty-third Pope, decreed that two priests and three deacons should accompany the Pontiff to be witnesses of his life and conversation, which seems to have been a precaution taken against the false accusations of the Novatian heretics. According to some, the council against them was held by Lucius. Origen died about the beginning of his Pontificate, aged sixty-nine, in the city of Tyre.

One of his last works was against Celsus the Epicurean. The cruel prefect of Rome, Perennius, the instrument of Valerian, inaugurated the persecution by the execution of the Pope. He was beheaded, and on his way to death committed the care of the Church a second time to Stephen the archdeacon, as Cornelius had done before him. He was Pope for about two years, and created in two ordinations held in December, seven bishops, four priests, and four deacons. He was buried in the Cemetery of Calixtus on the Appian Way. The See was vacant a month and five days.

A.D. 258.—St. Stephen the son of Julius, a Roman and archdeacon of the Holy Roman Church, was elected twenty-fourth Pope. Letters passed between him and St. Cyprian on the baptism of heretics. The Pope enforced the Apostolical tradition that baptism administered in proper form is valid, and not to be repeated. The Montanists and Donatists re-baptised Catholics who fell away to them, and Tertullian is said to have given countenance to this practice. Rome launched its sentence against it, and the bishops of the Synod of Iconium were excommunicated by Stephen for adhering to it. The bishop of Alexandria, the learned Dionysius, was brought to submission and agreement with the Pope, and he wrote to say that the bishops of Asia and Africa had now come to the same mind. Firmilian and Cyprian remained unconvinced; but it is thought he retracted his opinion before his martyrdom, as his loyalty to the Popes was great. He continued to hold it during the time of St. Stephen. This great and holy Pontiff decreed that the sacred vestments should be worn at Mass and in the Church, but not elsewhere, by bishops, priests, and deacons, and that others not in holy Orders should not usurp them. The proud and ostentatious Paul of Samosata put forth his heresy that Christ had begun from Mary, renewing the doctrine of Artemon that He was mere man, and was the forerunner of Arius.

Meanwhile the persecution raged with anti-christian violence, and twelve of the cardinal clergy of Rome suffered martyrdom. Their names were Bonus, Faustus, Maurus, Primitivus, Calumniosus, John, Cyril, Basil and Theodore, Exuperantius, Castulus, and Honoratus ; their place of martyrdom was near the aqueduct on the Latin road. The Pope was obliged to take refuge in the Catacombs. He converted and baptised Olympius, a tribune, and his wife Exuperia, with his son Theodulus, together with Nemesius, a tribune whom he afterwards ordained deacon, and Symphronius and Tertullinus, who all died martyrs. Stephen himself gave them solemn burial with recitation of psalms. He miraculously restored the eyesight of Lucilla the daughter of Nemesius, and gave her baptism. These conversions and the progress of Christianity brought upon the Pope the fury of the persecutor, and soldiers were sent specially to take him. When he was found and brought into the presence of Valerian, according to the acts quoted by Oldoin from Baronius, the emperor said :

“ Art thou the man who art trying to upset the state of Rome, and to persuade the people committed to my charge to forsake the worship of the gods?"

The Pope replied :

"I am not upsetting the state, but I advise all men to leave their idols and adore the true God and Jesus Christ whom He has sent."

The emperor signed his sentence of death, commanding it to be executed unless he offered sacrifice in the Temple of Mars. St. Stephen, led thither, prayed that God would destroy the temple as He destroyed the Tower of Babel. Thunder and lightning followed and the temple fell ; the soldiers fled, leaving the Pope alone, and he returned to the Catacombs, where he was found at Mass and beheaded in his chair.

Some days after the martyrdom of St. Stephen, the soldiers found the boy Tarcisius, an acolyte who was carrying the holy Eucharist. They inquired what it was he bore, and rather than betray the holy mysteries, he was beaten to death with sticks and stones, but they could discover nothing on the body.

The persecution was most violent in Alexandria, where Macrinus, the chief officer of Valerian, advised by the magicians of Egypt, conducted it. He disembowelled children to consult the entrails, and is said to have instigated Valerian to persecute the Christians. When Valerian went to the Persian war, Macrinus was sent to Rome to take his place, and aspired to the empire.

St. Stephen was martyred on the 10th of August, and his body laid in the Cemetery of Callixtus. Ho condemned the third council of Carthage, which enjoined the renewal of baptism of heretics as well as that of Iconium. And he added the "Gloria in Excelsis" to the Mass. He held two ordinations, creating three bishops, six priests, and five deacons, and was Pope part of three years. The See was vacant twenty-two days.

A.D. 260.—St. Sixtus II., the first to have the same name as a predecessor in the Holy See, an Athenian, and a philosopher of great learning, was chosen the twenty-fifth Pope. The times were terrible; for, as St. Cyprian records, Valerian had decreed that all bishops, priests, and deacons should be at once summarily dealt with; that all senators, knights, and nobles found to be Christians should be condemned, beheaded, and their goods confiscated.

St. Cyprian, after a year's banishment to Curubis, was brought back to Carthage and executed, in the midst of a vast assemblage of spectators. His conscientious mistake, if he still held it, has not prevented him from being honoured with St. Cornelius in the Mass as a great saint.

During the disturbance of civil wars, the empire had relaxed its hold in the north of Europe. Posthumus had revolted and seized upon Gaul, which he held for ten years as master. Victorinus succeeded him, and then Tetricus, the governor of Aquitain, on the death of Victorinus, was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers. The Germans, crossing the Tyrol, entered the north of Italy, and descended as far as Ravenna. Valerian, occupied in the East, imprudently accepted the invitation of Sapor, the Persian king, to an interview, and was seized as a captive. There he received a terrible retribution for his crimes as the persecutor of the Church of God. For eight or ten years a captive slave, he served as a footstool to his captor to mount his horse ; and by his successor, another Sapor, he was flayed alive, and his skin, dyed red, was kept as a trophy. Odenatus and his accomplished wife, Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, asserted their independence, and gained from the Persians Mesopotamia, as far as Ctesiphon. Zenobia wished to be instructed in the Christian religion, but applied to the heretical Bishop of Antioch, Paul of Samosata.

The Sabellian heresy arose, which was a confused theism denying the Divinity of the Son and the Personality of the Holy Ghost. It had existed before in a different form, in the time of the great martyr Ignatius, amongst those called the Patripassians, who held that the Father suffered in the Flesh. The Sabellians were chiefly found at Ptolemais or Barce, in the Pentapolis. By these the way was being paved for the advance of the Arian and Macedonian heresies. The Millenarians, who proclaimed a reign of Christ on earth with all sensual delights, renewed the errors of Cerinthus, and were called Nepotians, from Nepos, a Bishop of Egypt, who embraced or put forth the doctrines of the sect.

St. Sixtus had been sent as Legate of the Pope to Spain, and brought back with him Lawrence, whom he created deacon of the Holy Roman Church, and Vincent, who returned to Spain. He made Genulfus, the son of Genitus, a Roman, bishop, and sent him with legatine powers as a missionary to Gaul ; and Fleury says he made Peregrinus Bishop of Auxerre. St. Fructuosus, Bishop of Tarragona, suffered at this time, burned alive in the amphitheatre, with his deacons, Augurius and Eulogius ; and St. Saturninus, at Toulouse, dragged to death by a bull ; and some place at this time the martyrdom of St. Denis at Paris, with Rusticus and Eleutherius. In Africa, the Martyrs of Utica, called, from their mode of death, the “Massa Candida,” two or three hundred in number, chose, rather than offer incense to the idols, to fling themselves into a burning lime-pit, where they were consumed.

The Pope, after eleven months and a few days of Pontificate, was seized on the accusation of preaching Christianity and holding forbidden assemblies in the Catacombs. He was taken in the Cemetery of Calixtus, brought before the tribunal of Macrinus, and condemned to die. As he was led to the place of execution, outside of the Capenian Gate, Lawrence, the deacon, wept and made complaint :

“Where are you going, my Father, without your son ? You were not wont to offer the Holy Sacrifice without your deacon. In what have I displeased you ? Try me, and see if I am worthy of the choice you have made of me to dispense the Blood of the Lord.”

St. Sixtus replied, “I do not leave you nor forsake you, my son ; for you a greater combat is in store. I am old and feeble ; you are young, and your triumph will be more glorious. After three days you will follow me.”

He then commended to his care, as archdeacon, the treasures of the Church, and was beheaded, with Quartus, on the 6th of August, and was buried in the Cemetery of Calixtus. On the same day, but at a different spot, the deacons Felicissimus and Agapetus, and the sub-deacons Januarius, Magnus, Innocent, and Stephen, were martyred, and buried in the Cemetery of Prætextatus.

The Prefect of Rome demanded of Lawrence the treasures of the Church.

Lawrence replied, "It is true that the Church is rich, and that the emperor has not treasures to equal it. Give me time, and I will show you them."

The prefect gave him three days, and he gathered together the halt, the maimed, and the blind.

"Is it thus you mock me?" said the prefect. "I know you despise death; but you shall not die easily."

He commanded a bed of iron to be brought, and Lawrence to be laid upon it. A slow fire was kindled below. The Christians present saw the face of Lawrence grow brilliant with light, and smelt a sweet odour as his body was consumed; but the Pagans did not perceive it. When roasted on one side, he bid them turn him on the other, and said, "It is cooked enough, and you can eat." He then raised his eyes to Heaven, and prayed to God for the conversion of Rome, and gave up his soul. There died with him four others—Severus, priest; Claudius, sub-deacon; Crescentius, lector; and Romanus, door-keeper. His body was borne by senators converted by his constancy, and buried in the Ager Veranus, on the road to Tibur.

St. Sixtus created two bishops, four priests, and seven deacons. Two Epistles are attributed to him—one to Gratus, on the Eternal Generation of the Son ; and another to the Bishops of Spain, on Obedience and Unity. The See was vacant thirty-five days.

CHAPTER VIII.

ST. DIONYSIUS, ST. FELIX, ST. EUTYCHIAN, ST. CAIUS.

NINTH PERSECUTION BY AURELIAN.

A.D. 262.—There are few scenes to compare in all the world's eventful history with the endurance of Lawrence on the bars, laughing at the terrors of death. Grand and magnificent as are the pages of the Catholic Church militant, they record few examples to equal in sublimity the death of the great deacon, who is reckoned by some a cardinal arch-deacon of the Holy Roman Church. What can equal, or even bear a distant similitude to, the glory of the great Mother who has given birth to such children? There is a touching pathos in the courage of boys and girls welcoming death; in the sweetness of Venantius at Camerino; of Agnes at the age of twelve, and the little Spanish boys, Justus and Pastor. But as a man is, so is his strength. David as a boy played with lions and with bears; but as a man, laughed at the Philistine. And it is this spirit—the spirit of Lawrence—which the Church sings of in her anthems when it praises him, and says that “God loves a cheerful giver.” How little must the soul of that man be—or rather how blighted, like the spirit of the arch-fiend himself—who can turn to a contemptuous sneer, or regard with bitter sarcasm, the heroic joy in death which has lit up with triumph in their last moments the faces of God's martyrs ! Who, with a pen dipped in gall, can call a holy martyr who thus smiled at death a "jester," while he affects to praise a persecuting monster, stained with pitiless bloodshed and impurity without a name. History distilled from such a pen is a poisonous draught, ignoring or blaspheming all that is grand and beautiful, and holding up to admiration what is base and detestable.

Another dreadful martyrdom, at which the imagination recoils, is that of St. Hippolytus. Seized in his own house, while in the act of receiving the Holy Eucharist, by the officers of Valerian, he was first beaten with clubs, and then, in mockery of his name, dragged at the tails of horses through thorny places, and rent asunder.

The twenty-sixth Pope was Dionysius, a monk or anchorite, whose origin Pope Damasus says he could not discover ; but, according to some, he was a native of Calabria. During his Pontificate there was some respite from the horrors of persecution ; for Gallienus, terrified at the retribution which fell upon Valerian, and the disasters of the empire, abstained from active measures against the Christians, giving himself up to luxury at Rome. Plotinus, the Neo-Platonist philosopher, was in great credit with Gallienus, and had many admirers amongst the Roman nobles. He pretended to have an attendant genius, like Socrates, and derided the vulgar notions of the heathen gods. Porphyrius, the enemy of Christianity, was his disciple. He died of the prevailing pestilence, at the age of sixty-six. St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, Bishop of Neocesarea, in Pontus, having brought to Christianity the whole of his people except seventeen, died also at this time. Paul of Samosata was condemned in a council assembled at Antioch, at which Gregory, afterwards a martyr, Bishop of Cesarea, was present. A full account of the proceedings was sent to Pope Dionysius by Maximus of Alexandria.

Gallienus, the emperor, was summoned from Rome in the midst of his pleasures by the news that the army of the Upper Danube had invested Aureolus with the imperial purple, and entered Italy. He hastened to Milan, and besieged Aureolus ; but was cut off by a conspiracy of his own officers. However, before he died he had time to nominate Claudius, the commander of the legions of Illyria, his successor in the empire. Claudius, whose elder brother, Crispus, was grandfather of Constantius Chlorus, defeated and put to death Aureolus. He won the title of Gothicus, by conquering in battle an army of three hundred thousand Goths and Sarmatians. Having thinned their ranks in a series of battles, he shut up the remainder in the passes of the Balkan until they surrendered.

A decree of Claudius is recorded, sanctioning the renewal of the cruelties against the Christians ; for he gave orders that "All Christians who were already in prison, or were found at large, should be punished without further inquiry." In accordance with this summary command, Marius, a noble Persian, with his wife Martha, and two sons, Audifax and Abachum, coming to Rome to venerate the tombs of the martyrs, were apprehended and led through the city. Their hands were cut off and hung about their necks; they were then beheaded at the sand-pits on the Cornelian Way, at the thirteenth mile-stone, and their bodies thrown upon a pyre to be consumed; but their half-burned remains were gathered by Felicitas, a Roman lady, and buried on her estate. St. Prisca, thirteen years old, a noble Roman girl, suffered martyrdom. Although so young, she was thrown into prison, accused of being a Christian, cruelly scourged, and exposed in the amphitheatre to be devoured by a lion; but the lion licked her feet. She was then put upon the rack, and, after other torments, was beheaded and buried at the tenth mile-stone on the Appian Way. The great St. Antony about this time retired into a life of solitude in Upper Egypt.

Pope Dionysius is given by some ten or eleven years of Pontificate, though others give him only six; he is thought to have died a natural death of old age. He was buried in the Cemetery of Calixtus, on the Appian Way, having held two ordinations, and created seven bishops, twelve priests, and six deacons. The See was vacant six days.

A.D. 273.—St. Felix, a Roman, the son of Constantius, was elected twenty-seventh Pope. Claudius, after two years of empire, died at Sirmium, and Aurelian, a Pannonian, who had risen from the ranks to be commander of the cavalry, was chosen by the soldiers to succeed him. He was distinguished for his great personal prowess, and is said, by Theoclius, to have killed with his own hand forty-eight Sarmatians in one day, and in other engagements nine hundred and fifty more, so that his legionaries in their songs celebrated him as the slayer of a thousand. The state of the empire demanded the aid of a warlike emperor, for it was beset on every side. The Germans of the Upper Danube, crossing the Alps by the Splugen Pass, had broken into Italy, and descended as far as Fano in Umbria. Rome was alarmed, and Aurelian, consulting the Sibylline books, offered the prescribed sacrifices. He defeated the invaders at Fano, and again at Pavia, and drove them out of Italy. Having saved Rome, he added to its walls, which he made more than twenty miles in circumference. He then turned his arms against Tetricus, the usurper of Gaul, who reigned as emperor in Aquitain, whom he defeated at Châlons and took prisoner. He passed then into Asia, where he beat the armies of Queen Zenobia, first at Antioch and then at Emesa, and shut her up in Palmyra. Flying from thence, she was taken captive on the banks of the Euphrates. Aurelian triumphed, and led in his train the two captives, Tetricus and Zenobia, but both were afterwards treated with kindness. Zenobia lived on an estate near Tivoli, and her family was reckoned among the nobility of Rome. Zenobius, Bishop of Florence in the time of St. Ambrose, is thought by Baronius to have belonged to it.

Aurelian at first seems to have favoured the Christians, and supported the orthodox against Paul of Samosata. Dorotheus, a learned eunuch who was a Greek and Hebrew scholar, is said to have been intimate with him, but being attached to Pagan superstitions, he founded temples to the gods, and erected a magnificent one at Rome in honour of the sun. He issued edicts to abolish Christianity, and the name of this great warrior is stained with the blot of persecutor of the Church, the ninth from Nero. He was preparing still more bloody edicts, and was on the point of signing them when his arm fell paralysed.

Many martyrdoms took place in Gaul, amongst whom were St. Savinian at Troyes, St. Reverian at Autun. At Præneste, in Italy, the boy Agapetus, aged fifteen, refusing to deny the faith, was first cruelly scourged, and then cast into prison and kept four days without food. Burning charcoal was put upon his head; he was hung with his head [downwards over the stifling smoke of a fire, boiling water poured upon his stomach, and his jaws broken. The judge who gave the sentence was struck dead upon his tribunal, but in pursuance of the imperial decrees, the boy was flung to the wild beasts, which refused to touch him. He was then beheaded. The triumph of grace is most signal in tender age, and the heroic constancy of the children in Japan, who offered themselves in their holiday clothes to martyrdom, makes the pages of the history of its Christianity, otherwise so illustrious, still more glorious. But even in Japan some pity was accorded to the tender age of children, while the prefects of Rome seem to have known no mercy.

Pope Felix soon fell a victim, and, according to Baronius, died a martyr after a Pontificate of two years and five months, though some give him four years. He decreed that Mass should not be said in places unconsecrated, except in case of necessity; that if the consecration of a place were doubtful, or in lapse of time forgotten, that it should receive consecration, saying that it could not be called a repetition, since it was not known to have been ever done. The decree seems to relate to the memories or sepulchres of martyrs, for the custom of the Catholic Church was ever to make use of such memorials as places for offering the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, and in churches to place relics of martyrs under the Altars, which seems in accordance with the words in the Apocalypse: "I saw under the Altar the souls of them which were slain for the Word of God." For Catholic Ritual in many things represents the mysteries of heaven unveiled in that sublime book.

In the time of St. Felix an heresiarch arose, who was first a slave, then an adopted son of the widow of a sage in Persia, whose books and money he inherited, taking the name of Manes. He fled from Persia to Mesopotamia, to escape the king's anger at the death of the prince whom he pretended to cure. There he spread his pestilent doctrines, and left twelve disciples, teaching that the God of the Old Testament is the author of evil. He narrowly escaped being stoned to death by the people, and in his flight was caught by the soldiers of the Persian king and flayed alive. His doctrine, that there are two principles, one of good, and the other of evil, and that the Old Testament and the creation proceeded from the evil principle, long continued to spread a baneful influence over a portion of the world. Fragments of a letter from Pope Felix to Maximus, Bishop of Alexandria, against the errors of Paul of Samosata and Sabellius, are quoted by St. Cyril, and in the Council of Chalcedon. He held two ordinations, creating five bishops, nine priests, and five deacons, and was buried at the second milestone on the Aurelian Way, on the spot where he himself consecrated a church, which was afterwards dedicated to St. Pancratius, the cemetery being called after him the Cemetery of St. Felix. The See was vacant five days.

A.D. 275.—Eutychian, an Etrurian, the son of Maximus, succeeded Felix. This Pope is said to have buried with his own hands three hundred and forty-two martyrs in various cemeteries within and without the city. He decreed that martyrs should be buried in a dalmatic and a robe of purple; moreover, that fruits, and especially grapes, should be blest at the offertory, which was an ancient custom, but was renewed by him against the errors of the Manichees. According to some he was Pontiff only for one year; but others, with more probability, give him eight years, for he held five ordinations, and created nine bishops, fourteen priests, and five deacons.

way to the East near Byzantium. A thunderbolt from heaven fell so close to him that the bystanders were terrified, and shortly afterwards he was killed by his soldiers while on the march to avenge himself on the Persian king. For eight months the empire was vacant, until Tacitus, an aged senator, was chosen, who reigned for six months, and perished in Cappadocia, succeeded by his brother Florian, slain at Tarsus after an empire of three months. Probus, a successful soldier and strict disciplinarian as a military commander, was made emperor. Deterred by the fate of Aurelian, he wished to put a stop to the persecution, and published edicts to that effect, but while employing his soldiers in draining the marshes of Sirmium, he provoked a mutiny by his severity. Flying for safety to a tower or castle cased with iron, he was there taken and killed. Carus, the prætorian prefect, with his sons Carinus and Numerianus, seized upon the empire; but Carus died by lightning falling on his tent. Carinus, residing at Rome, made himself odious by his vices, though the populace was gratified with the splendour of his entertainments in the amphitheatre. Numerian died in Asia, and Arrius Aper, the prætorian prefect, who kept his death for a time concealed, was suspected of his murder. The legions, putting Aper in chains, elected Diocletian, captain of the bodyguard, emperor. Diocletian, allowing Aper no time for justification, stabbed him with his own hand, and was proclaimed by the soldiers. The course of these events occupied about the space of six years.

• Pope Eutychian wrote two Epistles—one to the Bishops of Spain, another to the Bishops of Sicily, and dedicated a church to St. Prisca on the Aventine. He was martyred in the time of Probus, and buried in the Cemetery of Calixtus, on the Appian Way. His memory is kept on the 8th of December. The See was vacant nine days.

A.D. 283.—Caius, the twenty-ninth Pope, was chosen to succeed Eutychian. He was born in Rome, but by his father's side a Dalmatian, being the son of Caius Maximus, a relative of Diocletian, and by his mother's side a Spaniard. Nor was he the only Christian of the family, for Gabinius his brother or half-brother, and Susanna his niece, were martyred, Gabinius promoted to the priesthood after the death of his wife, and Susanna choosing to die a virgin rather than submit to be espoused to Galerius Maximinus, the adopted son of Diocletian. Caius was Pope for twelve years, and during his Pontificate the great and last persecution began. He marked out anew the regions or districts of Rome, as Pope Fabian and others had done before him, assigning them to deacons to keep a register of the martyrs and record their acts, and he is said to have arranged the order of degrees by which the clergy are successively promoted in ordination—namely, door-keeper, lector, exorcist, acolyte, sub-deacon, deacon and priest—but these ranks already existed, and his decree therefore required that a bishop legitimately ordained should ascend by these degrees. He also decreed that no laic should summon a priest to trial, and that no accusation of a pagan or a heretic should be received against a Christian.

Victorinus wrote in his time commentaries on Scripture praised by St. Jerome, and Pamphilus, the relative of Eusebius of Cesarea, the admirer of Origen, wrote out a great portion of his works with a defence of them.

The empire was divided between Carinus, master of Rome, and Diocletian, supreme in the East. Carinus either held in esteem or feared the Christians, and was not inclined to persecute; but he was soon obliged to gather all his forces to encounter Diocletian. They met at Belgrade, and the armies of the East and West were hurled upon each other. Diocletian was on the point of being defeated, when Carinus was slain by an officer whom he had injured. The new emperor, assuming the name of Jovius, and changing that of Diocles to Diocletianus, chose for his colleague a ferocious Dalmatian soldier, Maximianus, who took the surname of Herculus. In these two men subtle cunning combined with brutal violence were arrayed against the Church of Christ, for though at first Diocletian dissembled his hatred, or for reasons of prudence forbore to persecute openly, Maximian soon began to display his ferocity, and by his command the Theban legion was first decimated, and then the whole massacred, when he passed into Gaul to contend with Carausius.

Pope Caius for eight years escaped death, lying in concealment, sometimes in the Catacombs and sometimes under the protection of the emperor's own chamberlain, not so much for the sake of avoiding persecution as for the support and comfort of the Christians whom he visited by night. He ordained Tranquillinus priest, and the brothers Marcus and Marcellianus deacons, and instructed and baptised Sebastian, the commander of the first cohort, whom he named Defender of the Church for his signal courage in confirming and sustaining the spirit of the martyrs. His niece Susanna refusing to be the wife of Galerius Maximin, the adopted son of Diocletian, was put to death by the tyrant, strangled in her father's house, and the Pope's brother Gabinius suffered martyrdom. In the Breviary they are commemorated with Caius on the 22nd of April, though he seems not to have died at the same time, for it is said that he dedicated the house of Gabinius, which adjoined his own, as a church, and there celebrated Mass after their martyrdom. The church had the title of St. Caius or Gabinius and Susanna. At length, being sought for and discovered, Caius was beheaded, and was buried in the Cemetery of Calixtus, at the third milestone on the Appian Way, where his body was found in the second year of Pope Gregory XV. He held four ordinations and created five bishops, twenty-five priests, and eight deacons. The See was vacant for eleven days.

CHAPTER IX.

ST. MARCELLINUS, ST. MARCELLUS.

TENTH PERSECUTION BY DIOCLETIAN.

A.D. 295.—The thirtieth Pope was Marcellinus, a Roman, the son of Projectus, who succeeded St. Caius in the Chair of Peter. Hitherto, with the exception perhaps of Dionysius alone, each one of the Pastors of the flock had been called upon to lay down his life for the sheep. This fact, if other proofs were wanting, is sufficient to show the frequency of martyrdom. For if the Holy Father, for whose life and safety all the faithful must have been solicitous and used every measure for his protection, notwithstanding had to suffer death for the faith, the expectation of such a fate must have been familiar to every true Christian. Persecution had victims almost without ceasing either at Rome or in the provinces, except in the singularly-favoured Isle of Britain, until the time of Diocletian.

But now the storm burst upon the whole world. The Beast, as it is figuratively called in the Apocalypse of St. John, and the Vision of Hermas, was roused to fury as if the time of the abridgment of its power was near. The world of heathendom was not to perish without a struggle, nor the demon to lose his reign over it unavenged. The cunning of the old serpent was faithfully represented in Diocletian, and the lion's ferocity in Maximian. Gibbon paints it well when he speaks of Diocletian as "singularly mild in victory, but artful," and of Maximian as "the ready instrument of cruelty, and insensible to pity." He says ironically: "The motion of the world was maintained by the all-seeing wisdom of Jovius, and the earth purged of its monsters by the arm of Herculus." The sufferings of the Saints culminated to a climax as the time of deliverance began to draw near. Without attempting to assign the chronological order, we will follow the recorded list of the martyrs as they come in the course of the ecclesiastical year.

St. Lucy, the virgin of Syracuse, whose feast is on the 13th of December, is well named first, for besides the celebrity of her martyrdom, she prophesied the future peace of the Church on the death of Diocletian and Maximian. The next glorious name is St. Sebastian, on the 20th of January. His father was a nobleman of Narbonne, his mother a Milanese, and he was dear to Diocletian as a soldier, being appointed by him commander of the first cohort. He was a Christian in secret, until he was discovered by his kindness to the martyrs and his exhortations to them to be firm. This was especially noticed in the dreadful martyrdom of Marcus and Marcellianus, and reported to the emperor. St. Sebastian's lingering and double martyrdom is sufficiently well known. St. Agnes, on the following day, is equally famous, and it is needless to repeat her familiar story. The forty martyrs in Armenia, whose feast is on the 10th of March, suffered later under Licinius, towards the close of the great persecution. They were placed naked on a frozen lake to perish of cold, with a warm bath ready for such as would recant. One who yielded was replaced by the sentinel on guard, who saw an angel descend from heaven, bearing forty celestial crowns. Pancratius, a Phrygian boy of fourteen, who came to Rome, was baptised by the Pope, and refusing to renounce the faith, was beheaded and buried on the Aurelian Way. His festival is on the 12th of May. Peter the exorcist, who freed his gaoler's daughter from the devil, with Marcellinus, the priest who baptised her and her family, together with the Bishop Erasmus, clothed by Maximian in a red-hot coat of mail, suffered on the 2nd of June. The two brothers, Primus and Felician, are commemorated on the 9th. Felician, tied by his hands and feet to a stake, was left hanging for three days without food. His brother Primus was told by the prætor that Felician had recanted, and was honoured by the emperors. "I have learned," said Primus, "from an angel what has been done to my brother, and I would I were in the same martyrdom with him whom I love so dearly." The prætor, bringing in Felician, poured into the mouth of Primus molten lead. Both were then cast to the lions, who fawned upon them, and five hundred converts were made by the miracle, who embraced Christianity with their families. Primus and Felician were beheaded. On the 15th of June four Roman soldiers, Basilides, Cyrinus, Nabor, and Nazarius, confessing to be Christians, were thrown into a dark dungeon. As they prayed, light filled the prison, and Marcellus, the keeper of the prison, was converted, with many others. They were scourged with lashes armed with hooks, and after seven days brought before the emperor and beheaded.

Cyriacus, the deacon, who delivered Artemia, the daughter of Diocletian, from possession, with Sisinus, Largus, and Smaragdus, suffered on the 8th of August. Cyriacus was dragged in chains before Maximian's chariot, and then racked. Boiling pitch was then poured upon him. They were finally beheaded, with twenty others, near the gardens of Sallust, on the Salarian Way, and their bodies were first entombed there, but afterwards, in the time of Pope Marcellus, the lady Lucina, wrapping their bodies in linen with precious unguents, buried them at the seventh milestone on the Ostian Way.

On the 12th of August, Tiburtius, the son of Chromatius, prefect of the city, converted by St. Sebastian, declaring himself a Christian, was ordered by Fabian, the judge, either to sacrifice to the gods or walk barefoot upon burning coals. Tiburtius, making the sign of the Cross, walked upon the coals, saying ; "See by this that the God whom the Christians worship is the true God, for the glowing coals seem to me a bed of flowers." The judge, attributing it to magic art, commanded him to be led out of the city and beheaded. He was buried at the third milestone on the Lavicanian Way. Susanna, the virgin daughter of Gabinius, the Pope's brother, suffered on the same day, cruelly murdered in her father's house for refusing the nuptials of Galerius Maximinus, commemorated with Pope Caius on the 22nd of April.

On the 31st, St. Felix, who spit upon the idols, suffered with Adactus, so called because he raised his voice from the crowd to declare himself a Christian as Felix was led to execution. Adactus is almost the only victim of the long list whom the scoffing Gibbon singles out to name.

In September there follow Gorgonius, at Nicomedia, chamberlain of Diocletian; Euphemia, at Chalcedon, exposed to wild beasts; and Lucia, a widow, of Rome, accused of being a Christian by her son. She was put in a caldron of pitch and molten lead, from which she came forth unhurt, and, converting the noble Geminianus, was beheaded. On the 19th, St. Januarius, whose blood is still miraculous, suffered with his companions at Naples; and at Agaunum, in Valais, St. Maurice, with the Theban legion, which was first decimated for refusing to sacrifice, and finally, by order of Maximian, the whole of the remainder surrounded by the imperial troops and destroyed.

SS. Cosmas and Damian are remembered with special honour in the Mass. They were noble Arabian brothers, physicians to Diocletian and Maximin in their diseases. They had the gift of healing most incurable disorders. Being put to the most refined tortures, they remained firm. Thrown into the sea, tied hand and foot, they came out with their bonds loosed. Accused of magic art, they were thrown into the fire, and when the fire refused to consume them, they were beheaded. Their feast is on the 27th of September.

Vitalis, a slave, and Agricola, his master, a gentleman of Bologna, are commemorated the same month. Vitalis, tortured for a long time to induce his master to yield, was crucified with red-hot nails; Agricola was confirmed by his slave's constancy and example. They were buried in the Jews' Catacomb at Milan, and translated from thence by St. Ambrose.

The four Coronati, or martyr-crowned brothers—so called because their names were long unknown—Severus, Severianus, Carpophorus, and Victorinus, are commemorated on the 8th of November. They were beaten to death and their bodies flung to dogs, which refused to touch them, and entombed at the third milestone on the Lavicanian Way, near the sepulchre of five other martyrs in the same persecution, Claudius, Nicostratus, Symphorianus, Castorius, and Simplicius, sculptors, who refused to make statues of the heathen gods. These were shut up alive in leaden coffins and thrown into the Tiber. The relics both of the four and five were afterwards placed in the Church of the Quatuor Coronati, built in the city.

Theodore, a soldier, suffered on the 10th of November for setting fire to a temple, condemned to be burned alive; and on the 11th is the memory of Mennas, an Egyptian, who, from a soldier becoming a hermit, leapt into the amphitheatre in Phrygia, where the games were held in honour of the emperor's birthday, protesting against the foul and impious superstitions of Cybele, and was put to death with great torments. The body of Mennas was afterwards taken to Constantinople.

Chrysogonus, after two years imprisonment at Rome, was sent for by Diocletian to Aquileia, and there interrogated "If he would consent to worship the gods?" at the same time the emperor offered him honours.

Chrysogonus replied, "I worship the true God in my heart, and I praise Him with my mouth. The gods that are the images of devils I detest and abominate." He was beheaded on the 24th of November.

We may close the list of these more celebrated martyrdoms with St. Catherine of Alexandria, the victim of Maximin the nephew of Galerius, and St. Peter, the great bishop who foretold the apostasy of Arius. But besides these, multitudes of known martyrs might be added, for the persecution raged over the whole Roman world. Britain was not excepted, and was for the first time disturbed in its peaceful Christianity. St. Alban, an official at Verulam, converted by Amphibalus, died to protect his instructor. SS. Julius and Aaron are the only names recorded at Caerleon, but it is said that to escape the violence of the persecution, the Christians concealed themselves in dens and caves, and the number massacred at Lichfield gave it the name of the Field of Corpses. At Saragossa, in Spain, the Bishop Valerius was martyred with a vast number of companions, and the deacon St. Vincent, like his companion St. Lawrence, was laid upon a gridiron and roasted alive. At Complutum two little boys at school, Justus and Pastor, defied the scourge and other torments and were beheaded. In Asia the great martyr St. George, whose acts when freed from falsifications of heretics are now defended, endured unheard-of torments, and at the command of the tyrant walked in red-hot shoes.

In the plains of Palestine multitudes were exposed naked to wild beasts, and a whole city in Phrygia was consumed in flames with its inhabitants because they refused to sacrifice to the false gods. Pope Damasus relates that within thirty days seventeen thousand martyrs suffered, besides those who were condemned to the mines or to labour in the quarries, some with one foot dislocated or hamstrung behind the knee, and some with the sinews of the left leg cauterised or seared with red-hot irons. Theodoret tells us that an edict was proclaimed commanding the destruction of every Christian church throughout the world, to be executed on a Good Friday. Such was the persecution in which infidel writers can find but few names to record. Diocletian boasted in an inscription that he had stamped out Christianity from the world. He was superstitious and timid, and in some sacrificial rites received responses from the demons which led him to dread Christians. He chose for his assistant in the East a Pannonian herdsman, Galerius, a man whose very sight inspired terror, whom he invested with the purple and the title of Cæsar. Perhaps he chose him as a match for Maximian in ferocity, but he soon learned to be afraid of him, though at first he had ventured to treat him with contumely, making him follow behind his chariot on foot for having suffered a defeat in Persia. Galerius Maximinus was the type of a true persecutor, pitiless and horribly licentious. Under such emperors faith and chastity had no resource but to die. Christians holding offices were disgraced, soldiers cashiered and then martyred ; one who tore down an edict was skinned alive. Eyes were torn out and replaced with coals, sharp reeds were run into the most sensitive parts, and every imaginable torment was employed.

No wonder that fear invaded the very sanctuary. Pope Marcellinus was led to the sacrifice in the temple of Isis, and there, through fear or compulsion, offered two grains of incense. Three priests and two deacons accompanied the Pope to the door, and some Christians were present in the temple at the action, which they witnessed and reported. So it said in the acts, and though St. Augustin does not admit it, arguing against Petilian, it seems probable that in a moment of weakness, like St. Peter, Marcellinus fell ; and afterwards, when an assembly of bishops was held at Sinuessa, he presented himself as a penitent clothed in sackcloth, with ashes on his head. No one dared to condemn him, saying, " Judge and pronounce on thy own cause. The chief See is judged by none." " Peter also fell, and wept for his sin." Marcellinus would have abdicated, but his abdication was not received. He returned to Rome, and presented himself before the emperor to die. Before he suffered, he begged of the Priest Marcellus not to lay his body in the tomb, as unworthy of burial. He was martyred together with Claudius, Cyrinus and Antoninus, and their bodies lay for thirty-six days in the public way unburied. St. Peter appeared to Marcellus in a dream, and commanded the body of the martyred Pope to be entombed. It was buried in the Cemetery of Priscilla. Marcellinus held the Pontificate nine years and two months, and in two ordinations created five bishops, four priests, and two deacons. The See was vacant twenty-five days.

A.D. 303.—Marcellus, a Roman, the son of Benedictus of the Region via Lata, succeeded Marcellinus, with whom by some he has been erroneously confounded. At Rome, during the space of seven years, the Baths of Diocletian were building on the Quirinal, chiefly by the hands of Christian confessors condemned to slavery. The immense pile still in part remains to attest the magnificence of Rome in the days of imperial luxury, and to give a portion of its halls to form the Church of Our Lady of the Angels. Diocletian, at the same time with Galerius, investing with the imperial purple Constantius Chlorus, gave him the title of Cæsar; and Maximian, bestowing on him his daughter-in-law Theodora for wife, adopted him as his son. Constantius, divorcing Helena, the mother of Constantine, had a young family by Theodora, and ruled in Gaul and Britain. Thus the empire was divided into four parts, Maximian residing for the most part at Milan, and Diocletian at Nicomedia.

In the year 305, Diocletian, having assumed the Eastern tiara and triumphed at Rome, retired to Nicomedia, sick and ill at ease. He was in mortal dread of Galerius, and at his suggestion or command resigned the empire, returning to his native place, Dalmatia, where he built a palace of great size and magnificence. On the same day, by agreement, Maximian resigned the empire at Milan, and retired to a villa in Lucania. The terrible Galerius, as Lactantius relates in the eighteenth chapter on the death of persecutors, was the cause of this extraordinary step, and the panegyric of Gibbon is wasted on the humility of Diocletian. Galerius was the Master of the East, and would doubtless remember that once he had run behind the chariot of the tyrant. Severus was created by him Cæsar and ruler of Italy; but Maxentius, the son of Maximian, having gained the Prætorian guard, was master of Rome. Although Maxentius was the husband of his daughter, Galerius was much enraged at this, but he could not prevent it.

The number of Christians in Rome was now very considerable, and Pope Marcellus divided the city into twenty-five parishes or titles. The explanation of the origin of these has been already given, and the cardinalate shown to be contemporary with the Papacy. The division by Marcellus means that he carried out the work of previous Popes, especially of Cletus, Evaristus and Hyginus, for by command of St. Peter, Cletus is said to have ordained twenty-five priests. The district parishes defined by Marcellus, to which five were added, the title of Equitius by St. Silvester, and four more by succeeding Pontiffs, remained without change, being in all twenty-eight ancient titles, down to the time of Sixtus the Fourth.

The widow Lucina having given her property for the use of the Church, Maxentius was informed of it. He summoned the Pope Marcellus to his presence, and commanded him to give up the Pontificate and the name of Christian. Upon his refusal he was beaten with clubs, and then, for his degradation, made the keeper of a public stable or stall of beasts. In this condition the Pope, neither omitting his prayers or fasts nor his attention to the government of the parishes of the city, directed everything by letters. After nine months' captivity he was delivered by night, and concealed in the house of Lucina, whose dwelling had been dedicated as a church. There Marcellus was found officiating, and by order of Maxentius the beasts in public employment were brought into it, and the Pope again put to menial service to litter and attend to them, until he died of the confinement, feter and filth. The Church of St. Marcellus is built on the site of the house of Lucina, where the Pope kept the stall of beasts. His body was buried in the Cemetery of Priscilla, on the Salarian Way. He was Pope for five years and six months, and ordained twenty-one bishops, twenty-six priests, and two deacons.

Galerius and his nephew Maximin continued the persecution in the East, and St. Dorothea was put to death by Theophilus, the prefect of Cesarea in Cappadocia. The prefect taunted her, and asked her to send him some of the fruits of the paradise to which she was going. The virgin martyr promised to do so, and the prefect was visited by an angel bringing roses and apples of exquisite taste and perfume at the season of the year when they could not naturally be obtained ; he was converted to Christianity and died a martyr.

The martyrdoms in Egypt continued for years with great cruelties, especially in the Thebaid, and some were torn asunder by bending down the trees, which were suddenly loosed with the limbs tied to them. But it is time to close the curtain upon these scenes of suffering, for the three centuries allotted to the Church of the Catacombs are drawing to an end, and the day begins to dawn after the long night of persecution.

CHAPTER X.

ST. EUSEBIUS, ST. MELCHIADES, ST. SILVESTER.

A.D. 309.—Eusebius, a Greek, the son of a physician, was chosen Pope to succeed Marcellus, who, according to St. Damasus, was exiled from Rome during part of his Pontificate; and this is confirmed from some ancient records by Bollandus. In the life of Eusebius, Bishop of Vercellæ, it is said that he was brought to Rome by his mother, Restituta, a Sardinian lady, and baptised by Pope Eusebius, who gave the child his own name. Eusebius of Cesarea, of dubious Catholicity, who is said to have denied the faith in the persecution, wrote his “Ecclesiastical History” about this time, and the life of the martyr Pamphilus; and Lactantius, the disciple of Arnobius, taught a school of rhetoric at Nicomedia, but having few scholars, composed many works against the Pagans and in praise of Christianity. In his old age he was tutor to Crispus, the son of Constantine.

Maxentius, proclaimed emperor by the Prætorian Guard, invited Maximian to come to Rome from his retreat in Lucania. Upon this he wrote to Diocletian to follow his example and recover the empire; but the old wily statesman was too feeble or too sagacious to be lured from his last hiding-hole at Salona. Maximian, restored to public life, attempted to corrupt the soldiery in his own favour, and was nearly caught and killed by them with the connivance of his own son. He fled to Illyria, and from thence in fear of Galerius to Constantine.

Constantius Chlorus died at York—a man without reproach in an age of iniquity. An anecdote is recorded of him betokening a prince gifted with spirit and discernment. He retained in his service the Christians who had been true to their religion upon a trial to which he purposely put them, and dismissed those who had been false, saying “that men who were true to their God would be true to their master.” Constantine was about eighteen years of age when Chlorus, his father, was made Cæsar, and was serving as tribune under Galerius in the East. The tyrant was jealous of him, and when he was sent for by his father, endeavoured to detain him. According to an author quoted by Photius, he was exposed, under honourable pretext, to a combat with a Sarmatian gladiator and a lion. Galerius, having given permission to him to travel, intended to cancel it the next day : but in the night Constantine, having received his permit, left Nicomedia, and taking the public relays of horses, travelled with wonderful celerity through Bithynia and Thrace, and across Europe to Boulogne. In person he was tall and handsome, expert and dexterous in all exercises, and prudent and chaste as well as brave. On the death of his father he was hailed Emperor of the West by the legions, to which title he succeeded by right, as his father for the last two years was styled Emperor ; but he preferred the humbler name of Cæsar, and at the age of thirty-two entered Gaul with his army, to protect the bank of the Rhine. He sent messengers to inform Maxentius of his succession, and wished to be at peace with him, for Maximian met him at Arles and gave him his daughter Fausta in marriage ; and to cope with Galerius and the power of the East, it seemed necessary that the West should be united.

Maxentius treated his proposals with indignity and bid him defiance. He had been successful in corrupting the soldiers of the Cæsar Severus sent against him by Galerius, and Severus died at Ravenna. Then Galerius himself, at the head of the Eastern legions, prepared to invade Italy and besiege Rome ; but his soldiers demurred, and he retreated. He survived his disappointed revenge some three years, but the hand of God was heavy upon him. His monstrous unwieldy body was incurably diseased, breeding lice and worms, and its stench insupportable. Before he died he issued an edict with a sullen retraction of the persecution of the Christians. He left the East divided between Licinius in Illyria, and Maximin Daia, his brutal nephew, in Asia.

Diocletian was invited to be present at Arles at the nuptials of Constantine and Fausta, but he refused to come, and then, timid and despairing, ended his life, as it is supposed, by poison. Even his admirer, Gibbon, allows that when he resigned the empire at Nicomedia to retire to Salona, and made his last appearance in public, his countenance was so ghastly and pale that he could hardly be recognised.

Maximian could not refrain from schemes of aggrandisement. In the absence of Constantine—summoned to war with the Franks—Maximian spread a report of his death, seized upon his treasures, which he distributed to the soldiers, and took the title of emperor ; but surprised by Constantine before he could consolidate his power, he fled to Marseilles, and there was either most deservedly put to death, or, as is said, strangled himself with his own hands. Such was the end of the three persecutors—an example to mankind, that even in this world chastisement awaits the open enemies of Christ and His Church.

Meanwhile Maxentius filled Rome with violence and rapacity. He was avaricious, cruel, and so licentious, that a Christian lady, Sophronia, stabbed herself to preserve her chastity. The Prætorian Guard, raised to its old evil eminence and establishment, was the support of his tyranny. At one time he is said to have pretended to favour the Christians, and Pope Eusebius is thought to have died a natural death. The number of Christians in Rome was so great, that policy most probably prevented him from open persecution. But he was superstitious in the extreme, and, in his fear of Constantine, inquired into futurity by diabolical rites of divination, cutting open infants, and even it is said out of their mother's womb.

Pope Eusebius held but one ordination in the month of December, creating fourteen bishops, thirteen priests, and three deacons. He was Pope, according to the best authorities, only one year and seven months, and was buried in the Cemetery of Callixtus on the Appian Way. The See was vacant but one day, or, as Oldoin says, for seven.

A.D. 311.—Melchiades or Miltiades, an African, or, as some say, a Spaniard by birth, a cardinal presbyter of the Holy Roman Church, was elected Pope—the thirty-third in the chair of Peter. He passed decrees against the Manichees, and forbade fasting on Sundays and Thursdays, in opposition to heathen observances on those days. Assisted by St. Silvester, he buried Timotheus, a cardinal priest who suffered martyrdom, and he himself is styled a martyr.

Constantine, invited by the senate and people of Rome, who were weary of Maxentius, crossed the Alps by Mont Cenis, and descended into Italy. It is said that before he resolved upon this step—while he deliberated at Treves on the war and his chances of success—he saw at midday the apparition of a luminous cross above the sun with the legend, “By this conquer,” and that he was instructed in a vision by night in the meaning of it, to fight under the banner of Christ. It is certain that the standard, or “Labarum,” was a pike with a transverse beam, from which depended a veil of silk, and on the summit was a coronet of gold, enclosing the sacred monogram, which combined the figure of the cross with the Holy Name, for medals exist of it with the inscription, “By this conquer,” and it became the standard of the imperial legions. Eusebius, although he passes over the miracle in his history, relates it in his "Life of Constantine," and says of the banner that it spread terror and dismay in the ranks of the enemies. He declares that he heard the account of the vision from the emperor's own mouth, attesting the truth of it in the most solemn manner, though he adds, to his own shame, for he was a lukewarm Catholic, if a Catholic at all, that he would not have otherwise believed it. The banner, he says, was entrusted to fifty chosen men, and inspired invincible courage in the soldiers. There was something extraordinary in the successes of Constantine. He was met at Turin by a superior force of horsemen in complete armour, but he defeated them and cut them to pieces. Again at Verona, Pompeianus, the general of Maxentius, met him with a similar body of troops, far superior to his own in numbers. Constantine, performing exploits of great personal valour, discomfited it, and took an immense number of captives. He then marched to the Saxa Rubra, nine miles from Rome, and found Maxentius prepared to give him battle with an army still more numerous than those he had defeated at Turin and Verona, amounting, according to Zosimus, to a hundred and seventy thousand.

Forced to come out into the field, Maxentius had consulted the Sibylline books and received an answer: "That on that day the enemy of the Romans would perish." The cavalry in complete mail formed the strength of his army. Constantine charged these in person and routed them. The Prætorian Guard fought with desperation, and died on the ground it covered. The rest of the troops fled, and were driven by thousands into the Tiber. Maxentius, endeavouring to escape into the city by the Milvian Bridge, was forced by the crowd into the river, and drowned by the weight of his armour.

Constantine entered Rome A.D. 312, and remained for two or three months. He abolished for ever the Prætorian Guard, and destroyed their fortified camp, thus putting an end to the political power of that proud licentious soldiery, and delivering Rome from an incubus, but at the same time diminishing its importance as a seat of empire. He was soon called to contend with Licinius, who divided with him the world. But first they met at Milan and published an edict forbidding the persecution of the Christian religion, and this became the law of the empire.

Maximin Daia continued to the last the persecution in the East, distinguished above all other persecutors for brutal licentiousness. He died a horrible death. Having vowed to Jupiter to exterminate the Christian name if he gained the victory, he engaged in battle with Licinius. Being utterly defeated, he fled by the passes of Mount Taurus to Tarsus. There in desperation he first feasted to the full, and then swallowed poison, which, owing to his repletion, took very slow effect, and for four days he rolled on the ground in agony, beating his head against the walls. In his tortures he cried out to Christ for mercy, exclaiming that his bowels were burning as with fire, and so, howling aloud like a beast of prey, he expired.

Pope Melchiades held a council against the schismatic Donatus, at which nineteen bishops were present, and amongst them Cæcilian, the Bishop of Carthage. The Donatists appealed to Constantine, who referred them to the Pope and the Council. It is said that it was held in the Lateran, in the house of Fausta, which Constantine had given to the Pope as a residence. The schismatics were condemned, and revenged themselves by fabricating false charges against Melchiades.

The Edict of Milan not only gave liberty of worship to the Christians, but enacted that all places and properties which had been seized or confiscated belonging to Christian communities should be restored to them without dispute and without delay, and enjoined officials to see that this was executed. It is important to note this, for donations made to the Church, especially in Rome, were already very considerable.

Melchiades held only one ordination in December, creating twelve bishops of various Sees, and in the city of Rome fourteen priests and five deacons. He was Pontiff for two years, according to Baronius, though others give him three, and he was buried in the Cemetery of Callixtus, being styled a martyr, and commemorated on the 10th of December. He probably suffered martyrdom in an outbreak of Pagan animosity, for it is said that when the augurs were restored to their official duty by an imperial edict, they raised a tumult against the Christians under pretext of a lustration of the city, and that on this account St. Silvester retired for safety to Mount Soracte. The See was vacant for seventeen days.

A.D. 314.—St. Silvester, the son of Rufinus, a Roman, was educated for the priesthood by his holy mother, Justa, and made cardinal priest by Pope Marcellinus. He was elected, on account of his consummate virtues, twenty-fourth Pope, and held the Pontificate for twenty-two years, during which a change came over the face of the world, inaugurated by laws bespeaking the influence of Christianity.

The emperors of the West had resided at Milan, and Constantine issued his first edict from thence; but about the fifth or sixth year of Pope Silvester he visited Rome, and issued new laws of the greatest importance, sitting in the Ulpian Basilica in the Forum of Trajan. It was the custom of the emperors by ancient precedent from the time of Augustus to renew every ten years their authority by the voice of the senate and people, and this custom was observed by Constantine. These, his laws, betoken a religious and Christian spirit. First he decreed the free and public exercise of divine worship by throwing open the churches and closing the temples, and that Sunday should be observed and public business cease on the first day of the week; that Christians should have power to manumit their slaves without legal process; and that marriage should be held sacred, and concubinage strictly forbidden. He forbade the exposing of infants to die, and made provision for poor parents to maintain their children, in order to prevent this horrible custom; and to protect female virtue, he enacted that those guilty of offering violence to it, and even of seduction under false pretences, should be given to the wild beasts or burned alive.

The infidel may sneer at the tone of severity of these laws protecting chastity, but they proclaim that the reign of justice and humanity, and, above all, chastity, had begun. It is the voice of Christianity, and the sound of a sweet note above the world's uproar, inaugurating the reign of the Son of the Virgin. The old world knew nothing of virginity or the sacred smile of infancy. The freedom of the slave is another sublime note betokening a change in the destinies of mankind, giving the death-blow to the horrors of the amphitheatre and proclaiming the opening of the ergastula, or the slave-prisons of Rome. The keeping of the Lord's Day, the elevation of the married state, and consequently of domestic life and the family, the protection of maidenly honour, the saving of the infant in its helplessness, the liberation of the slave, the closing of the amphitheatre, is like the proclamation of the Great Jubilee to the world, weary as it was of bloodshed, tyranny, and superstition.

It is strange, and something marvellous to believe, as some would have us, that Constantine was no Christian. It is out of the scope of this work to enter into discussions which alone would involve voluminous research and labour. The objections against the Catholic tradition are founded chiefly on some passages of Zosimus, a heathen, and Eusebius, an Arian, who is of doubtful faith in Catholic matters.

Constantius Chlorus was chaste, and of such virtue and wisdom that he may be suspected of at least Christian leanings. Helena, the mother of Constantine, was his wife, for Maximian stipulated for a divorce. The story that she was an unchaste daughter of an innkeeper of Drepanum, coming from the pen of a heathen, is a fiction untenable in chronology, as proved by Baronius and Alford. The more generally received tradition is that she was of royal British extraction. Constantine, like his father, was chaste, and was married early to Minervina, from whom he had a son, Crispus. She was dead when he married Fausta, for no divorce was required, and no one has accused him of incontinence. The tradition supported by Anastasius, two councils, and two Popes, Gregory of Tours and others, is, that he was baptised by St. Silvester, and for his want of faith and temporising in embracing it, after the benefits he had received, he was struck with leprosy, of which he was cured in baptism. The account that he deferred it until he should receive it in the river Jordan is, as Platina observes, an improbable story.

After his final victory over Licinius in the great battle of Hadrianople, in which with inferior numbers he defeated an army of a hundred and fifty thousand men, A.D. 324, Constantine, sole emperor of the Roman world, by letters circular, invited all his subjects to imitate his example and embrace the Christian faith. He could hardly have done this unless he were himself a Christian, nor if he were only a catechumen could he have spoken of himself as he did in a public discourse, according to Eusebius, as a partaker in the Christian mysteries.

The following year the council was assembled at Nice for the condemnation of Arius, presided over by Hosius and the Roman priests, Victor and Vincent ; and this was done at the expense of the emperor, who provided the bishops with means of travelling, and received them at a banquet after the council. In all this we see the Christian emperor, and he shewed moreover his filial submission to the Church in refusing to listen to the complaints of bishops who preferred them to him, saying that " His was not the tribunal of appeal in things pertaining to God." He is called by St. Ambrose a holy emperor, and the Greeks account him a saint.

Even the enemies of Constantine acknowledge his extraordinary bravery. With only twelve horsemen he swam the Hebrus before his army to encourage them to meet Licinius. He was blamed by his own officers in the battle of Verona for endangering his life, and, like the soldiers of David, they entreated him not to expose himself to such a risk again. The blot of his life is the death of Crispus in the twentieth year of his reign ; but if, as Gibbon allows, it was brought about by the cruel false accusation of his stepmother, Fausta, it is an instance of Constantine's extreme severity in crimes against chastity. When he discovered, too late, the innocence of his son and the falsehood of Fausta, he justly condemned her to death. By Fausta he had three sons, Constantinus, Constantius, and Constans. The half brother of Constantine, Julius Constantius, had two sons, Gallus, and Julian afterwards the emperor and the apostate.

St. Silvester confirmed the decrees of the Council of Nice in an assembly of bishops at Rome, and about the same time, a year after the Council of Nice, according to many authors, St. Helena discovered the Holy Cross at Jerusalem, part of which she brought to Rome and placed in the Basilica, which from thence derives its title. Constantine is said to have been at that time in Rome, and as she was of great age, being eighty years old, dying soon after, she was buried in a mausoleum on the Lavicanian Way, at the Church of the Martyrs, Marcellinus and Peter, built and endowed by her son.

Nicephorus relates that after the session of Constantine in the Ulpian Basilica, twelve thousand Romans received baptism from St. Silvester, without reckoning women and children, and the Pope, holding a council, decreed that the holy chrism should be consecrated by a bishop, and that confirmation should be given to those who had received heretical baptism on their reconciliation : that priests should anoint with chrism at baptism, and the deacons at Mass wear the dalmatic with a stole on the left shoulder ; that the priest's alb, or vestment, should be of white linen, without admixture of coloured work ; that priests should not have women residing in their household, except they were their mothers, sisters, or aunts ; and the clergy should not be summoned before a lay tribunal.

It is said that a crown or jewelled diadem was offered to the Pope by Constantine, but that he preferred to wear a Phrygian mitre woven of silk and gold, which was preserved in the Church of St. Martin in Montibus. Also it is said that the emperor offered him the government of Italy.

Councils were held in the Pontificate of St. Silvester at Arles, at Ancyra, Neocæsarea, and Alexandria and Rome, besides others which did not receive the Pope's approbation. The Œcumenical Council of Nice was presided over by Hosius, Bishop of Corduba, legate apostolic, and two cardinal priests of Rome, Victor and Vincent. Arius was condemned, and out of three hundred and eighteen bishops, six who followed his heresy were deprived of their sees. St. Athanasius was present at the council.

The decrees of the Popes on keeping Easter upon the Sunday following the fourteenth day of the moon in March were promulgated to the world, and it was acknowledged that the Pope's approbation was required to give force to the decrees of a council.

St. Silvester held six ordinations in the month of December, creating sixty-five bishops of various sees, and forty-two priests of the city of Rome, and twenty-six deacons. He was Pope, according to some, for twenty-three, but according to Baronius, twenty-one years and ten months. He was buried in the Cemetery of Priscilla on the Salarian Way, but his body was afterwards translated by Sergius II. to the Church of St. Silvester in Montibus, built by him under the title of Equitius, and endowed by Constantine. After his death, which is commemorated on the 31st of December, in the year of Our Lord 335, the See was vacant for fifteen days.

CHAPTER XI.

THE DONATIONS OF CONSTANTINE.

THE Roman Church was already rich by private donations, and was able to assist other churches. As instances of what must have been much more frequent, St. Pudentiana and St. Praxedes gave their house in the Via Patricia for a church, and St. Cecilia her house in the Trastevere. The martyrdom of Pope Marcellus was caused by his refusal to give up to Maxentius the property which the widow Lucina had given to the Church. The titular churches were those which had funds to support them, and when the Edict of Constantine came into force these possessions became legal, and the restitutions made must have been considerable. Moreover, it was appointed that certain tributes should be paid over in perpetuum to the clergy, and in order that priests and widows might receive endowments, the law was taken away forbidding unmarried persons to inherit property after the age of twenty-five.

That Constantine gave the Pope the rule over Italy is treated as a figment by Protestant writers, and looked upon with doubt and suspicion by others; but the learned Gretser defends it, with Baronius and Cardinal Torquemada. It does not follow because the instrument of the so-called donation is fictitious or inaccurate, that therefore nothing was given.

The munificence of Constantine as a founder of churches was great, as attested by Eunapius, a Greek and a heathen, who says "that most august temples were overthrown throughout the world, and Christian churches built by him in their stead, and the expenses paid out of the imperial treasury." Sigonius, in the "History of Italy," a writer of very high authority, says that he gave to the Church "not only vessels and gifts in gold, but rich possessions in landed property" (Hist. Regn. Ital.).

Some of these endowments must be instanced as given by Platina and Ciaconi.

To the church in the gardens of Equitius—founded as a titular church by St. Silvester—he gave a golden chalice and other vessels of silver and gold, and an estate in Sabinum for its support, and a house and gardens within the city.

He gave the Lateran Palace, and built the Church of St. Saviour, which, with its ornaments and statues of massive silver, was most costly. The estate of Bassus, in the ager Coranus, was given for its support, with houses and gardens in the city and lands in Greece and Africa.

He built the Vatican Basilica in honour of St. Peter. The relics of the Apostle were enclosed in a vast mass of brass mixed with copper, and placed beneath the tomb, over which was erected a cross of gold weighing a hundred and fifty pounds. Besides other holy vessels, he gave three chalices of gold, and for endowment, possessions in Antioch, and revenues from gardens, mills, baths, and shops in Rome.

He built the Basilica of St. Paul on the Ostian Way, where the body of that Apostle was placed, enclosed in brass in a similar manner to that of St. Peter. He gave the same weight of vessels in gold and silver, and a cross of gold over the tomb weighing a hundred and fifty pounds. Revenues were given to it from Tarsus, in Cilicia, and from Tyre. This Basilica was enlarged by the Emperor Honorius, the son of Theodosius.

The Basilica, afterwards entitled St. Cross, in Jerusalem, was built by him and endowed with the lands of the Sessorian Palace, to receive the portion of the Holy Cross brought by his mother, St. Helena, which he enclosed in a case of silver adorned with jewels and gold. Also the Church of St. Lawrence out of the walls was built and endowed by him with lands in Agro Verano.

At the request of his daughter, Constantia, the Church of St. Agnes was built by him, with a baptistry where his sister and his daughter, Constantia, were baptised, and was endowed with lands at Fidenæ. The Church of Marcellinus and Peter the exorcist, Martyrs, where his mother, St. Helena, was buried, was endowed with Messana and the Isle of Sardinia.

To these must be added the church at Ostia, which he endowed with lands at Ardea, and the churches at Capua and Naples.

This will suffice to make good the words of Sigonius, that Constantine gave rich possessions of land, and he adds that in almost all the provinces of Europe and Africa there were possessions of the Patrimony of St. Peter ; so that without entering into discussion as to the mode in which it was granted, the Pope had in possession from the third or fourth century, lands which were afterwards called " the Patrimony," in Lombardy, Tuscany, Sabinum, Calabria, and Sicily, and rectors or administrators of these estates were sent by the Pope, as we find in the letters of St. Gregory the Great. This continued until the Lombard kings invaded these possessions and despoiled the Pope ; but they were compelled to disgorge their prey by Pepin and the Franks, who "restored" to the Pope the Pentapolis, Ravenna, and Emilia, which implies previous possession.

Soon after the great battle of Hadrianople and the taking of Byzantium, Constantine fixed upon that city as his imperial residence. The walls and principal edifices were built in a few years, and, according to some, in a few months, and the second or new Rome was dedicated in the year 330. Here again Constantine built the magnificent Church of the Twelve Apostles, whilst he built others at Antioch, Jerusalem, and Hebron ; and in the Holy Land, according to Nicephorus, he built thirty-two churches, so that indeed he may be styled a munificent founder of the Church in all the world.

Sozomenus says that " He gave certain tributes accustomed to be paid to the imperial treasury by cities and provinces to the Church and clergy in perpetuum," so that thus everywhere the Catholic Church began to be supreme. For the Church only requires to be free to be strong, and, without process of installation, the removal of the seat of empire from Rome made the Pope and Christianity dominant in Italy. Naturally, and without effort, when the temporal power was moved away, as if to make room, the kingdom of God took its position above the fragments of the old heathen fabric, and the Pope became the prominent figure in the world ruling in the Eternal City. The reign of the saints, whose blood had been shed like water, began upon earth, and Christ and His Vicar raised aloft the Cross triumphant over His enemies, proclaiming new laws of chastity and charity. Great changes are effected in the world insensibly and without effort. The work of Providence is stately and slow, like the rising of a deluge, and nothing is violent. To the eye of an unbeliever, the progress of Christianity does little or nothing, but to the eye of faith the transfiguration is miraculous. The change in old Rome was in fact marvellous, and its fall from its ancient glory and terrible magnificence was a deadly wound to the power of the prince of this world. In place of the beast whose iron teeth had broken to pieces the kingdoms of the earth and of the great statue seen by Nebuchodonosor—the little stone descending from the mountain and crushing the giant idol filled the earth—Constantine, who triumphed under the Cross, raised it above the imperial crown, and, acknowledging Christ to be his Master, yielded the first place to Him, abandoning the old Rome to be the centre of the world and the seat of Peter, to shine henceforth as the light of all nations and the glory of the Christian people.

In St. Silvester's time some northern nation or nations were converted to the faith, and the names of Frumentius, Julianus, and Edisius are recorded as missionaries to the heathen sent from Alexandria. The great St. Antony was famous for his sanctity, and St. Helena and Constantine recommended themselves to his prayers.

If all the sums expended by this great emperor in building churches could be calculated, they would exceed the expenditure of Solomon, for two millions of gold pieces are said to have been spent on the Church of St. Saviour alone ; and if to these sums are added the liberal gifts of land and tributes, there is little need of further question as to the donation of Constantine. He gave the Church of Rome independence, bestowing upon it a very large revenue. He did away with the power of the Prætorian Guard, and removed the seat of empire, leaving the Pope free, the uncontrolled master of large estates, whatever may have been the limits of them. Not only Italy, but Greece, Africa and Asia are mentioned as contributing to the support of the Church of Rome.

To quote again the words of Sigonius : Constantine gave the Church " rich possessions of land." He gave it freedom and a certain dominion, and not only in Rome, but throughout the world, he supported it liberally, acknowledging its authority, and has merited the title of Great, as a brave and wise emperor, and, it may be added, as good and holy prince, and well-deserving of the world. His laws bespeak a man of large and enlightened mind, and they changed the face of the civilised world, or rather formed the germ of its civilisation; for so long as heathenism was dominant, with its idol-worship, its bacchanalian and blood-stained rites, its child-murder and uncontrolled licentiousness, its slavery and oppression, Europe could not be called civilised. Meekness and gentleness of manner, springing from charity, are the characteristics of true civilisation, and by his obedience to the Church and subordination to it, as representing the majesty of God, Constantine laid the foundations of the fabric of the Heavenly City, ruling in this world under the Vicar of Christ, to whom the proud powers of the earth are so unwilling to bow the head.

CHAPTER XII.

THE FALL OF HEATHENISM.

Two cities have been portrayed in the preceding pages, one rising and the other falling, side by side, the City of God and the mystical Babylon, the City of Confusion. The kingdom of Christ has been slowly rising out of the ruins of the fall of heathenism. It can hardly be imagined how appalling, and yet how seductive, the power of heathen superstition was before the reign of Christian principles began to prevail, though painted in some of its most revolting features by the pens of the heathen themselves, and but slightly veiled in the dubious and half-ironical praises of Gibbon.

Three features of the splendour of ancient Rome represent the principal allurements of old pagan life which was passing away, the baths, the amphitheatres and the temples. A succession of emperors spent on these—but especially on the two first—incalculable sums, pandering to the luxury and passions of the people. It was a donative to the populace by which they won the name of munificent benefactors, and supplied the meanest citizen of Rome with the greatest of gratifications.

The Baths of Nero, Caracalla, the Antonines and Diocletian, and others which have been briefly mentioned, were open to the public for the fourth of a penny. The bathers were supplied with unguents, unless they preferred to bring with them more expensive perfumed ointments. Cold, or tepid, or hot and vapour baths were ready, and some took vapour baths of a very high temperature and then plunged in cold water. Before entering the bath or course of baths they stripped in public and took exercise in halls or porticoes : and round the bathing-rooms were gardens and porches or saloons in which poets declaimed and philosophers lectured. The immense fabric often covered a square of a thousand or two thousand feet, and was adorned within and without with costly marbles, paintings and statues. Some of the most famous ancient pieces of sculpture, such as the Farnese Hercules and the group of the Laocoon, have been found in the ruins of the baths. Theatres and temples were sometimes included in the building. The richest marble quarries in the world supplied the pillars, and the pavement and walls were beautifully decorated, so that nothing was wanting which luxury or magnificence could suggest.

The passion for bathing was great among the people, and laws were enacted that the baths should not be open before a certain hour, which was usually two in the afternoon, and should be closed before the evening fell, to avoid abuses. But, notwithstanding, great disorders are said to have taken place under the later emperors. In proportion to their evil propensities, the tyrants of Rome vied with each other in raising these costly edifices, and Christian confessors toiled in their construction. The last and most splendid were the Baths of Diocletian.

With Christianity a change came, and a new spirit breathed amid the corruption which had so universally prevailed. The publicity, the ornaments and accompaniments of the baths and their costly luxury were not agreeable to Christian modesty. This virtue, unknown or disregarded in heathen life, gradually leavened the public taste and manners, and the blood of Cecilia and Agnes and the virgin martyrs, with the devotion to the great Virgin Mother of God, gave birth to a veneration for chastity and honour of virginity. Old things passed away or were purified, as in the laver of a baptismal regeneration, and new things took their place by a solemn transformation as grace began to prevail. A higher and purer beauty, both in idea and in art, arose as stately churches in honour of the apostles and the martyrs were built, or ancient basilicas adapted to the usages of true religion. To the eyes of the infidel and the sceptic the scene which was dissolved may appear more agreeable, as it was more alluring, and Rome in the day of its triumph was grand with an earthly glory, but the Christian turns away instinctively from the contemplation of the old wickedness and sensuality of Paganism, to the humbler, but purer, spectacle of the gospel virtues leavening the corruption of mankind, and the mystical City of God building not for time, but for eternity.

The second great feature of heathen life and manners is represented by the amphitheatres. In these the pomp and magnificence of the Pagan holiday was chiefly displayed. The cost of the Coliseum was something fabulous, and would have sufficed to build a large capital city. According to Dion, nine thousand wild beasts were exhibited in the hunts or shows at its dedication. A thousand ostriches, a thousand deer or antelopes and a thousand wild-boars were turned into the arena at once by Probus, and the emperors vied with each other in their exhibitions of strange or savage beasts, by which they gained the fame of munificence and won popularity. Helio-gabalus earned contempt and derision by a show of thousands of mice and weasels. The emperors sat in state on the suggestus, that is under a canopy on the podium or platform immediately above the arena, to preside at the games. Scented liquids were scattered profusely over the assembly through concealed conduits, and awnings were extended above to screen the whole audience from the heat of the sun, supported by masts fixed in rings round the circumference of the theatre and managed by sailors. The difficulty of extending these curtains over so vast a surface and managing them in a wind when extended, has given rise to much discussion, and Lucretius compares the rattling of them shaken by the blast to a thunderstorm.

Sometimes beasts fought with beasts, elephants with tigers, panthers, or lions, and sometimes men contended with them, as in the modern bull-fight, armed with a sword and a veil to throw over the eyes of the animal. But the favourite entertainment was the inhuman sport of matching gladiators in pairs, and these were numerous in proportion to the solemnity of the show. We see in the pictures or frescoes which have been exhumed at Pompeii that sometimes horsemen in full armour, like medieval suits, fought with shield and lance. The Thracian, or Samnite, so called from his buckler and fashion of accoutrements, contended with a Gaul, or myrmillo, in a hideous mask or helmet with closed visor. The retiarius, who carried a net to throw over his adversary, and a trident, or three-pronged spear, was matched with a man-at-arms. These trained gladiators were kept by the masters or lanistæ in great numbers, and were at times, from their force and desperation, causes of alarm to Rome. On more than one occasion they broke out and stood for their lives against the soldiery, as it mattered little to them how they were butchered. They were usually bound by an oath to fight for the glory and die in obedience to the laws of the arena. Such were the amusements of the people and even of the matrons of Rome.

The appetite for blood engendered by these frightful exhibitions required to be fed, and was from time to time satiated with the slaughter of Christians; and the people, accustomed to it, saw with unconcern the death of the martyrs, torn to pieces by lions or tossed by bulls, though they wondered at their strange intrepidity, or, as they termed it, insensibility. By an Edict of Constantine, the shedding of human blood in the theatres was forbidden, and the hateful custom ceased. The faction fights of the race-course of Constantinople for the several colours of the white, red, and blue, were the last remnants of the ancient games.

This again was an extraordinary change wrought by Christianity, and an instance of the transforming power of the true religion. By degrees slavery was eliminated with its barbarities. Livy relates the story of a poor slave driven with blows across the circus before the games began, under the fork, that is, with the heavy instrument of torture on his neck, and that the festival was declared by the augurs to be polluted.

In the "Odyssey," when Ulysses comes home, he hears late at night the sigh of the feeble female slave, having accomplished her task of grinding at the mill; and since the days of the Pharaohs of Egypt this melancholy lot had been the condition of an immense portion of mankind. In imperial Rome the labour of life was chiefly done in the slave-factories or prison-houses, and one master would be the possessor of tens of thousands of these captives. Christianity gradually did away with the inequality of men and nations, and the hard indifference to human life and suffering which characterised heathenism, for it created ties of affection between man and man hitherto unknown. But it raised up especially the domestic union of the family, giving to woman and to the mother her place and her respect. The pleasures of the heathen were public, they had no home; they lived in the baths, in the theatre, in the forum. Except for the banquet, they spent little of the day at their houses. Hence the importance attached to these public places of amusement—the baths and amphitheatres. Christianity, by creating charity and human sympathy, and by cementing the family, opened new pleasures which overcame and expelled the selfish customs of the past. The creation of the family home is eminently Christian, and the source of the happiness of nations is the lesson of charity and mutual forbearance learned at the domestic hearth.

The third great charm of heathen life was its mythology, with its poetry, peopling the earth and sea as well as Olympus, and its hero worship, the beauty of its temples and the splendour of its religious rites and festivals. Greece had moulded statues to represent the Jove of Homer, with ambrosial locks, and Apollo as when he descended to loose his arrows on the camp, or slay the Python. Diana and Cytherea lived in marble, and grottoes and groves had their nymphs and naiads. Hero-worship exercised a powerful influence, especially in the localities where the mighty dead were honoured. In a writer of the second century we find sailors attributing a storm at sea to their neglect in honouring Ulysses as they passed Ithaca. The same author describes a procession or embassy of youths and maidens to Delphi, bringing a hecatomb in honour of Neoptolemus. It is worth transcribing for its testimony to the prevalence of hero-worship alluded to so frequently in the pages of Herodotus, as well as for the description of a religious procession bringing a hecatomb for sacrifice.

“First came the hecatomb, conducted by men initiated in the sacred mysteries, habited in a simple rustic garb. Their white tunics were gathered up with a belt, leaving the right breast and arm and shoulder bare. In their hands they bore a battle-axe with a double blade. The bulls were all black, curving their necks, which were slightly arched, and with even straight horns, partly gilded and partly wreathed with flowers, crook-kneed, and with dew-laps hanging down to their knees. They were exactly a hundred, and other victims of different kinds followed, each in order and in droves apart, conducted with music of pipes and flutes, playing a prelude to the sacrifice. Then followed a company of Thessalian maidens, clad in beautiful embroidered tunics, with broad girdles and loose-flowing hair. They were divided into two choirs, one of which carried baskets full of flowers and fruits, and the other baskets of sweetmeats and fragrant spices, which filled the air with sweet odours. They made no use of their hands to carry these, but balancing them upon their heads, danced in order, hand in hand, going on in procession as they danced, while one choir sang, the other joining in the refrain."

Then follows the hymn sung in praise of Neoptolemus, son of the great Achilles, and grandson of Thetis, praying him to be propitious and to avert evils.

"The melody was so sweet, and the time they kept with the beating of their feet so exact, that the pleasure of the ear surpassed that of the spectacle, and the crowd of lookers on were entranced, as they gazed and followed with their eyes the maidens as they passed along, until their attention was drawn away by the troop that followed of young men on horseback, and the chief of the embassy appeared, showing a sight surpassing all that could delight the ear. The troop of youths was fifty in number, twenty-five on each side of their leader, forming his bodyguard. Their buskins were laced with purple thongs, and their white mantles, clasped with buttons of gold, were bordered on the edge with blue. Every horse was from Thessaly, with the free look of its wide plains, champing at the bit disdainfully, as if they needed no such reminder to obey the rider. They were so covered with ornamental trappings, and decked with frontlets of gold and silver, that each seemed to vie with the other in splendid furniture.

“The leader” (of the race of Neoptolemus) “eclipsed the rest; like them, he was on horseback and in armour, carrying a lance of ash-tree wood with a cusp of bronze. His head was unhelmeted, and his scarlet mantle, embroidered with gold, represented the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ. Its morse or clasp was an amber Pallas, having on her shield the Gorgon’s head.”

The work of Heliodorus, of Tricca, in Thessaly, from which this is taken, contains much to illustrate the splendour of religious worship, especially in honour of Phœbus and Diana. He was a native of Emesa, and of the royal family of the priests of the sun, and hence the frequency of his mention of Apollo. Afterwards, as a Christian, he was required to burn his work, probably as painting heathenism in too favourable a light.

The tendency of Paganism was to deify Nature, and to increase the love of this life with its fleeting pleasures. Thus the odes of Horace are full of thoughts upon the enjoyments of the present hour ; to make the most of them, because they cannot last long, and when youth is past and age is come, there remains nothing but the tomb. The cypress alone will weep over the sepulchre and follow its master, therefore the rose must be gathered while it blooms ; brief life must be enjoyed, for then the three sisters cut the web, the poor ghost will depart to the shades, and all must go where Tullus and Ancus are gone. The melancholy thought that death ends all is made use of to enhance the necessity of making the most of the present, as the Egyptians of old carried round the banquet-hall the bodies of the dead, to exhort the guests to be merry while life lasts. Man bids farewell to life for ever, the envious gods alone enjoy happy immortality. Such was the thought of the Pagan.

It is obvious how much this hopeless and dreary prospect must have increased the eagerness for the goods of the present life, and this was the petition of the heathen, that the gods would avert the evils of the present and give them long and pleasant days. It is needless to dwell on the morality engendered by such thoughts, and by the very names of the deities, the objects of worship. The Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans gives a summary of the state of the heathen, and the " Satires " of Juvenal and " History " of Tacitus are a comment upon the catalogue of their sins. " Who," exclaims the satirist, " in such times of depravity could abstain from invective ?” Hero-worship itself, which in former times was paid to the noble or renowned, degenerated into the worship of Antinous, the favourite of Hadrian.

But another odious feature, less spoken of, but not less practised, was the use of magic and enchantment, common amongst the vulgar, as appears from the tale of Lucian. Heliodorus describes the method of practising necromancy or inquiry from the dead, with horrible rites performed over a corpse by a professor of the art, and Horace has allusions as to the prevalence of witchcraft. The emperors themselves, Maxentius, Maximinus Macrinus, and others, inquired into the future by divination, not only from the entrails of victims, but from slaughtered infants. Idolatrous superstition is seldom or never free from dealing with the devil, and Julian, when he endeavoured to restore Paganism, studied and practised the arts of magic.

Into Rome, as a centre, flowed all the superstitions of the world, of the Phrygian Cybele, the Egyptian Isis, of the Phœnician worship of the sun and the mythology of Greece. The empire, as it embraced, admitted the gods of every nation, and adopted every form of error ; but all alike tended to encourage a love of this life and a horror of death, excepting alone the death of the renowned of old and a glorious sepulchre. But this had long sunk into oblivion, and the general state of society was a professed seeking of sensual enjoyment as long as the gods permitted life to last, and the dreaded Proserpine and fatal sisters allowed the thread of allotted days to be spun unbroken.

When St. Paul preached at the Areopagus, his announcement of the resurrection of the body and a life to come was received with derision by the sages of Athens, but some believed. The preaching of Christianity is the preaching of the resurrection—of judgment and life to come. Of this the Catacombs are full; the paintings for the most part represent the vivifying power of grace, the restoration of Lazarus to life, the rising of Jonas from the jaws of death, Noah delivered from the deluge and Daniel from the lions, bespeaking the language of hope. Instead of the old inscriptions on the tomb “Farewell for ever”—“In æternum vale”—we read in the cemeteries, “Innocent soul, refreshed in Christ, pray for us!” “In light and peace, pray for us.”

This truth once established in the soul, the joys of the present life, which so quickly pass away, and of which the heathen poet complained that even in the very moment of gratification there is something in the height of them which embitters, become in comparison of little worth, and its pains for the sake of future joys not only endurable, but desirable. This thought kept Lawrence firm upon the coals, and filled the martyrs with hope and joy. It is the groundwork of the faith, as St. Paul proclaims, “For if the dead rise not,” he says, “our faith is vain.” “Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die,” thus summing up the principle of Christian life and the despairing doctrine of the heathen.

When the cry arose in the Ulpian Basilica, “Let the temples be closed, Christ is the true God,” the Church of the Catacombs, after three centuries of blood and oppression, came forth triumphant over superstition and idolatry, and the laws of Constantine established, together with the worship of the true God, the law of Christian charity, and liberty to the slave, and the law of chastity and conjugal fidelity. To dissolve these is to return to heathenism and its corruptions, for if the bond of marriage is broken, the worst kind of licence prevails, and society is wounded and poisoned at its source ; if charity, founded on the unity of faith, is banished to make room for a hollow philanthropy, the body politic becomes a cloak for mutual aggression, until it ends in a reign of terror ; and if truth ceases to be the basis of religion and every man makes gods of his own or worships none, a double darkness descends upon the earth, for in Pagan times the God of Nature had at least a semblance of honour, while modern impiety, having rejected grace, cannot return to natural simplicity.

It may seem that the change under Constantine is pictured in rosy colours, and that his coins, as well as some historians, present him in a more unfavourable light. The absence of Christian emblems on his coins is no positive proof, nor is tradition to be thrown aside because opposed by enemies of Catholicity. It is not said that in his earlier reign he openly avowed or acknowledged the truth of Christianity, but, after his promulgation of the laws which he issued from the Ulpian Basilica, he became the public protector of the faith and worship of Christ, and his triumphal arch accords with the Catholic tradition.

APPENDIX I.

ON THE CARDINALS.

ALTHOUGH the "name" of the cardinal bishops, priests and deacons of the Holy Roman Church was not given from the very first, but came in progress of time, nevertheless the office existed from the beginning, attached to the Pontificate, the duties of which could not be adequately fulfilled without the assistance, counsel and ministry of many subordinate officials. Such were Linus, Cletus, Clement, Anacle-tus, and Mark the Evangelist in the time of St. Peter, and others, who were his coadjutors and counsellors. Pope Evaristus divided the city into parishes with titles or parochial endowments, and Hyginus assigned to the clergy the order of their rank. The seven deacons were appointed to the care of the seven regions of the city shortly after the times of Nero, and in the time of St. Silvester the names of the seven given in the Council of Rome held in the Baths of Domitian were, Fabianus, Marcus, Liberius, Arcidamus, Julius, Priscus, and Theodorus.

The Roman Church was very soon enriched by the contributions and legacies of pious men and women. These afforded support to the titles or parish churches to which the cardinal priests were attached. Such were the ancient titles of Equitius, Vestina, Pammachius, Lucina, Julius, Callixtus, Eudoxia, Damasus, Pastor, Emiliana, Crescentiana, Fasciola, and Tigridis. When the revenues from the villas or farms or moneys attached were abundant, two or three cardinal priests were appointed to a title. For instance, three subscribe themselves of the title of Julius—Paulus, Marcellinus, and Septimius ; three of the title of Equitius—Felix, Sebastianus, and Adeodatus ; two of Marcellus—Timotheus and Venantius ; and this was the manner of signature in the persecuting times ; but when public churches were opened, after the time of St. Silvester, the church was named, as well as the title, and the signature in full was, for example, Laurence, cardinal priest of Silvester in Esquilie, under the title of Equitius ; John, cardinal priest of SS. Vitalis, Gervase, and Protase, under the title of Vestina ; Andromachus, cardinal priest of St. Peter ad Vincula, under the title of Eudoxia.

The number of the cardinals, unless the words of Pope Anacletus are to be understood to restrict them to seventy-two, is not defined. He says “that the seventy-two disciples elected by the Apostles are a type of the Presbytery, and that they are represented by it in the constitution of the Church.” The number varied at various times. In the Pontificate of Pius IV. there were seventy-six ; in that of Paschal II., ninety. In the time of Innocent II. and Celestine II. there were only forty ; from Boniface VIII. to Sixtus IV., only thirty. They were increased to fifty under Alexander VI., to sixty-two under Leo X., and to seventy-six under Paul III., Paul IV., and Gregory XIII. Sixtus V. had seventy.

The twenty-eight most ancient titles are thus given by Anastasius the librarian :

1. Sti. Julii, alias Sti. Callixti, alias Stæ. Mariæ Trans Tiberim.

Then follows a list of the archpriests, of the titles, twenty-four in number, and eleven minor priests, after which is a list of the cardinal deacons :

DIACONI CARDINALES VII.

Joannes, Diac. Card. in Regione II^a. et IX^a.

Cælius Joannes, Diac. Card. in Regione VII^a. et XIV^a.

“By the constitution of Sixtus V.,” says Fr. Oldoin, “the number of cardinals was determined to seventy, of which fifty were priests, fourteen deacons, and six bishops.”

The cardinal priests were reckoned first, and after the cardinal priests the deacons, who at first were seven, and afterwards fourteen, to whom four deacons of the palace were added by Gregory III., so that at one time there were eighteen, with the following titles :

S. Mariæ in Dominica.

Sti. Lucæ in Circo.

Stæ. Mariæ Novæ.

SS. Cosmæ et Damiani.

Sti. Hadriani.

SS. Sergii et Bacchi.

Stæ. Mariæ in Silicæ, alias Caput Suburræ.

SS. Viti et Modesti in Macello Martyrum.

The four deacons of the palace were not long retained, but were made cardinal priests.

The cardinal bishops were the last in order of creation, and though they have varied somewhat in number under various Popes, were generally seven, assistant bishops of the Lateran Basilica, with titles from neighbouring cities or states :

1. The Cardinal Bishop of Ostia.
2. The Cardinal Bishop of SS. Ruffina and Secunda, or of Silva Candida.
3. The Cardinal Bishop entitled Portuensis.
4. The Cardinal Bishop of Sabinum.
5. The Cardinal Bishop of Præneste.
6. The Cardinal Bishop of Tusculum.
7. The Cardinal Bishop of Albano.

APPENDIX II.

THE CATACOMBS.—THEIR NAMES AND LOCALITIES.

FIFTY cemeteries, more or less, for some reckon sixty, may be counted in subterranean Rome. The most ancient is the Cemetery of St. Peter, or the Vatican. Next to it, on the Aurelian Road, is that of SS. Processus and Martinian, with those of St. Calpodius, St. Julius, and St. Agatha. The Cornelian Road branches from the Aurelian, and though celebrated for the martyrdom of SS. Rufina and Secunda, has no cemetery upon it. These two roads run in a westerly direction from the Vatican. The Portuan Way runs south-east, and on it are the Catacombs of St. Felix, St. Pontian, and St. Generosa.

On the other side of the Tiber the Ostian Way has the Cemeteries of St. Paul, St. Timothy, and St. Felix and Adauctus, of St. Cyriacus and St. Zenon running in a southerly direction, as seen from the Vatican. Beyond it, in the same direction on the road to Ardea, which is a branch from the Appian, are the Cemeteries of St. Flavia Domitilla, SS. Nereus and Achilles, SS. Marcus and Marcellianus, St. Balbina and St. Mark. This is the most populous part of the subterranean city, for here the Appian Road has the Cemetery of St. Callixtus, and those of St. Zephyrinus, St. Prætextatus, St. Soter, and SS. Eusebius and Marcellus, which extend far away to St. Paul's.

More easterly, on the Latin Road, near St. John's, are the Cemeteries of SS. Gordian and Epimachus, SS. Simplician and Servilian, and on the Lavicanian Way the Cemeteries of St. Tibertius, SS. Marcellinus and Peter, with that of St. Helena, and of SS. Claudius and Nicostratus. To the east, on the Tiburtine Road, which runs to Tivoli, are the Catacombs of St. Lawrence and St. Cyriaca, of great extent. To the north-east, out of the Porta Pia, on the Nomentan Road, are the Cemeteries of St. Nicomedes, St. Alexander, SS. Primus and Felician, and of St. Agnes.

More towards the north, on the Salarian Way, lie the Catacombs of St. Priscilla, SS. Chrysanthus and Darius, St. Silvester, St. Felicitas, and St. Alexander; and on the old Salarian Way that of St. Hermes. Lastly, to the north-west, on the Flaminian Way, are the Cemeteries of SS. Valentine, Julius, and Theodora.

It is calculated that the catacombs would form a street three hundred leagues long, with six million tombs of the dead. They are cut in the granular tufo, which is sufficiently hard to support the shelves and form the galleries, while it is soft enough to be easily worked. They are entirely the work of Christians.

The bodies enclosed in the niches or shelves in the sides of the galleries were often wrapped in linen, with spices and aromatic gums, the odour of which was sometimes sensible when they were opened. The fossors employed under the seven regionary deacons were an order occupied in the work of excavation and burial. Sometimes when it was difficult or dangerous to carry out the debris, the galleries already used seem to have been filled, or partially filled again.

In the Cemetery of the Vatican a great number of Popes were buried, and afterwards of kings and emperors. The Cemetery of St. Calepodius, though probably of a more ancient date, is named from the martyred priest in the time of the Emperor Alexander, who was dragged through the streets of Rome and thrown into the Tiber, from which his body was recovered and buried by Pope Callixtus.

The Cemetery of SS. Processus and Martinian, the gaolers of St. Peter, in the Mamertine, is the most ancient, next to the Vatican, on the Aurelian Way, and between it and the Portuan Way is the Petra Scelerata, or stone of malefactors, on which were laid the four martyrs, Eusebius, Vincent, Peregrinus, and Pontian, in the time of Commodus, to be beaten to death. On the Cornelian Way, Rufina and Secunda have left their memories, who for their virginity suffered great torments, and were carried on that road to the Silva Nigra and there left dead. In the following night they appeared in a vision to Plautilla, a noble Roman lady of their acquaintance, and said, "Plautilla, cease to defile thyself with the worship of idols, and believe in Christ. Go to thy estate on the Cornelian Way, and thou wilt find our bodies ; give them burial as thou canst." She obeyed and believed, and from Silva Nigra the name was changed to Silva Candida, one of the titles of the cardinal bishops.

The cemetery on the Portuan Way is called from St. Pontian, a noble Roman, who concealed St. Callixtus in his house, and assisted him in the burial of Calepodius. It is also called the Cemetery of SS. Abdon and Sennen, Persian princes martyred in the Amphitheatre in the time of Decius, and buried there. The Catacomb of Generosa, near that of St. Pontian, is probably named from some noble lady, who, like the Lucinas—for there seem to have been more than one of that name—gave her gardens for burial.

The Cemetery of St. Timothy, on the Ostian Road, is named from a noble citizen of Antioch, who came to Rome in the time of Pope Melchiades, and from a zealous heathen became a convert and preacher of the faith. Tarquinius, the prefect of Maxentius, seized him and threw him into a dungeon, and besides other tortures, put him into burning lime. He was buried by the Pope, assisted by St. Silvester, and the lady Theodora laid the body in a garden near the Cemetery of St. Lucina.

In the Benedictine cloisters of St. Paul's there is this ancient inscription : " Under this altar rest the glorious bodies of the Apostles Peter and Paul (that is to say, a portion of them, for the other portion is laid in the Church of St. Peter), but their heads in the Lateran ;" and a stone is preserved on which is inscribed, " On this table of porphyry the bones of the holy Apostles Peter and Paul were divided and weighed by the Blessed Silvester, Pope, in the year three hundred and nineteen, when this church was built."

The Cemetery of St. Cyriacus is named from the deacon, who, like St. Lawrence, was laid on the rack until all his bones were dislocated and then scalded with boiling pitch in the time of Maximian. Largus and Smaragdus and twenty soldiers suffered with him.

The Cemetery of Flavia Domitilla, on the road to Ardea, also called of St. Petronilla, dates from the Apostolic age. The daughter of St. Peter, or, as some say, his spiritual daughter Petronilla, was buried there, and afterwards Flavia Domitilla, niece of Titus and Domitian, who vowed virginity in the time of St. Clement. She was banished to the isle of Pontia, and, on her return, burned alive in her house with her two maidens Euphrosyna and Theodora at Terracina, from whence the bodies were brought to Rome by Auspicius, and buried in the crypt on her estate. Her two faithful martyred servants, SS. Nereus and Achilles, give their name to the same cemetery.

Between the road to Ardea and the Cemetery of St. Callixtus, on the Appian Way, extends the Cemetery of SS. Marcus and Marcellianus, two brothers condemned by the Prætor Fabianus in the great persecution under Diocletian. They were nailed to a tree, and their bodies pinned to it with javelins or lance-heads in every limb, until the prætor said, "Unhappy men, relent and be delivered from your torments!" And they replied, "Never was feast more delicious than the pains we endure for Christ. We are now fixed secure in His love." They were encouraged by St. Sebastian. The adjacent Cemetery of Balbina is named from the daughter of a tribune Quirinus, who was cured by kissing the chains of Hermes, the prefect of the city, converted by Pope Alexander. She devoted herself, like Lucina, to the burial of the martyrs. The Pope St. Mark built a church over the catacomb, and was himself buried there. On the Appian Road is the Cemetery of St. Callixtus. The entrance to this great cemetery is ordinarily made from the basilica of St. Sebastian. Here amidst innumerable martyrs were laid the bodies of Pope Anicetus, Anteros, Pontian, Fabian, Cornelius, Lucius, Stephen, Sixtus II., Dionysius, Eutychian, Eusebius, and Melchiades. The body of Sebastian, recovered from the sewer into which it had been cast, was buried in the Cemetery of St. Callixtus. A portion of the cemetery received its name from St. Cæcilia, and another portion from St. Sixtus. In this catacomb the arcosolium or arched tomb is more frequent, which is at the extremity of a chamber or cubiculum, and when the chamber was designed to form a chapel, the arched tomb was usually over the body of some great martyr.

The Catacomb of Prætextatus is one of the most ancient and extensive of the cemeteries. It contains some of the largest crypts and galleries, which seem to have served as a place of refuge. St. Prætextatus suffered martyrdom in the great persecution, having first been condemned to the mines. St. Sotera, martyred in the same persecution by Maximian, was a noble Roman virgin, who offered her face to the blows of the executioners, and gives her name to a portion of the cemetery. Another portion is named from SS. Eusebius and Marcellus, priest and deacon of Pope Stephen, by whom Adrias and Paulina, with their children, were brought to baptism. They were seized by a cohort of sixty soldiers, sent to take them in the crypt, with Hippolytus, and martyred by Valerian.

St. Eugenia, the daughter of Philip, Prefect of Egypt, gives the name to a cemetery on the Latin Road. Appearing to her mother Claudia, after martyrdom, she said, "Rejoice, mother, for the Lord has brought me into the joys of heaven. You will come to me on the Lord's day that is at hand. Tell my brothers Avitus and Sergius to be faithful to the sign of the Cross, that they may come to partake of our happiness." In the same catacomb on the Latin Way, Pope St. Stephen buried the martyrs Sempronius, Exuperius, Olympius, and Theodulus in the persecution of Valerian. The Cemetery of SS. Simplicius and Servilian, at the second milestone on the Latin Way, is more ancient, and belongs to the time of Trajan. Converted by the example of Flavia Domitilla, they were put to death by Anianus, prefect of the city, and buried by the Christians in a garden two miles from the walls. Contiguous to that of St. Simplicius is the Cemetery of St. Tertulian, who suffered a dreadful martyrdom in the persecution of Valerian.

On the Lavicanian Way is the Cemetery of SS. Tiburtius and Marcellinus. Tiburtius was the son of Chromatius, a young noble of Rome of great beauty in the time of Pope Caius, in the persecution of Diocletian. Denounced by a false Christian, Torquatus, to the Prefect Fabianus, he was commanded to walk upon burning coals, which seemed to him like a bed of flowers, and then beheaded. Tiburtius appeared in a vision to Lucilla and Firmina, his relatives, and, accompanied by Marcellinus and Peter the exorcist, commanded them to bury in the cemetery beside him the martyrs of the Silva Candida, Rufina and Secunda.

Near this cemetery, on the Lavicanian Way, is the burial-place of the Empress St. Helena, mother of Constantine, who erected there, in honour of the martyrs and for the love of his mother, a basilica of which there exist some remains. The four saints called the Quatuor Coronati, and their five companions, Claudius, Nicostratus, Symphorian, Castorius, and Simplicius, the sculptors who refused to make idols, were buried in this catacomb by a Christian, named Nicodemus, who drew their bodies out of the Tiber. The four Coronati, Severus, Severianus, Carpophorus, and Victorinus, are said to have been buried in this catacomb by St. Sebastian and a holy priest, who was afterwards Pope St. Melchiades. Their bodies, thrown to the dogs at the statue of Esculapius, could not be got possession of until five days after their martyrdom. The Cemetery of St. Castulus forms a portion of the same catacomb. He was of the household of Diocletian, and concealed the martyrs until he was betrayed by the same false Christian Torquatus who betrayed Tiburtius. The galleries are very narrow and tortuous in this cemetery, as if for concealment.

The Campus or Ager Veranus, on the road to Tivoli, was given by Cyriaca as a Christian sepulchre, and the body of St. Lawrence was laid there. She suffered martyrdom when of advanced age, and gives the name to a portion of the cemetery. An immense number of martyrs were buried in the Cemetery of St. Lawrence, amongst whom were Hippolytus, Abundius, Justin, Tryphonius and Cyrillus. The youthful Cyrillus, cruelly martyred by Decius, was left a prey to the dogs, and buried by St. Justin.

On the Nomentan Way is the ancient Catacomb ad Nymphas, where Papias and Maurus were buried in the time of Diocletian. In the fifth year of the building of the baths, the prefect Laodicius, seated on the tribunal in the Flaminian Circus, interrogated these two Christian soldiers. "I know that you are Christians," said the judge. "Yes, we are." "Leave your error and adore the gods." "To adore them is to renounce everlasting life." "If you do not adore, your life will be short; do as I tell you and you shall live." "Do sacrifice yourself, and you will live in everlasting fires."

A shower of blows upon them followed this reply. They continued to exclaim: "Christ, support Thy servants." They were beaten to death with scourges laden with balls of lead. Their bodies were buried by night, "ad Nymphas, where Peter baptised," on the Nomentan Road. On the same road is the Cata-comb of Nicomedes, a martyred priest in the time of Domitian, discovered burying the dead.

Also the Catacomb of the Pope Alexander is on the Nomentan Way, put to death by the judge Aurelian with Eventius and Theodulus. Severina, the wife of the judge, buried them in her villa at the seventh milestone. Beyond is the Cemetery of SS. Primus and Felician, martyred in the time of Diocletian. At the fourth mile is the Cemetery of St. Agnes. Her extreme youth, beauty, and courage have made her name one of the most famous among the army of martyrs. In this catacomb the primitive paintings are remarkable for their beauty.

The Via Salaria to the north has the ancient Cemetery of St. Priscilla, venerable as the burial-place of the house of Pudens the senator, and his daughters Praxedes and Prudentiana. The popes Marcellus and Silvester were buried in this catacomb, and Pope Marcellinus and his companions Claudius, Cyrinus, and Antoninus, after having lain unburied for thirty-five days, were laid there in a "cubiculum clarum," or vaulted chamber of more conspicuous size.

On the old Salarian Road is the Catacomb "ad Clivum Cucumeris," where, in the time of Claudius, when the edict was given out that the Christians in prison should be despatched without further inquiry, two hundred and sixty Christians employed in the sand-pits on the Via Salaria were shot to death with arrows by soldiers, and their bodies thrown to be burned on a great pyre, from which some were snatched by Marius and Martha, with their sons Audifax and Abacuc or Abacum, a Christian pilgrim from the East, and buried in this cemetery. Forty-six soldiers were martyred for having received baptism in the year 269, and buried by the priests John and Justin, "ad Clivum Cucumeris," and in the persecution of Diocletian a thousand soldiers, with their captain, Maximus, were martyred and buried in this cemetery.

The Cemetery of Theodora, on the Flaminian Way, completes the circuit of Rome. Here were laid the bodies of Abundius, priest, and Abundantius, deacon, who, on the way to martyrdom, restored to life the son of Marcius. By order of Diocletian, all were put to death, and they were buried with spices and aromatic gums by Theodora, at a distance from the city, on the Flaminian Way.

This résumé of the localities and chief names connected with the catacombs is taken from the work of the Abbé Gaume, entitled, "Les Trois Romes." It supplements and confirms the respective Lives of the Popes.

APPENDIX III.

ST. HELENA.—HER BIRTHPLACE.

THE discovery of the true Cross by St. Helena has given her celebrity in the annals of the Church, and throws a light upon the history of Constantine. After the victory over Maxentius, or when he became the master of the world, his mother went into the East to see the Cross under which her son had conquered. She discovered it by a miracle, and brought a portion to Rome, for the reception of which the Sessorian Basilica, otherwise called the Basilica of Helen, was built by Constantine, afterwards called St. Cross in Jerusalem, because a great quantity of earth from Calvary was placed in the chapel containing the holy relic.

Four massive golden candlesticks and fifty lamps of silver, five gold chalices and an altar of massive gold, were among the donations to the church, which have disappeared in the spoliations of Rome. But when the church—which was restored by St. Gregory II.—underwent alteration and renovation in the year 1492, the workmen discovered above the central arch, within the church, a hollow place, which, when it was opened, was found to contain a lead case covered with a square marble slab, on which was written, "This is the title of the true Cross." Within the case was a little board, the edges of which were wasted by time, upon which was engraved, in letters painted red, "Jesus Judæorum Nazarenus rex," the word Judæorum partly gone from decay. The whole city ran to see it, and Pope Innocent himself came and ordered it to be kept in the case under a glass, and to be exposed only once a year on the festival of the church. St. Helena, following an ancient usage, had placed it in this elevated position when the church was built. In the chapel, which is dedicated to St. Helena, besides the portion of the Cross, are two thorns of the crown of thorns, and one of the nails with which Our Lord was crucified, and the sponge which was presented to Him dipped in gall.

The reverence which he paid his mother in building this basilica and the mausoleum, with a noble church, on the Lavicanian Way, shows the real disposition of Constantine. If his zeal for the Cross, after the miracle which gave him victory, seems to have languished for a time, it must be remembered that he succeeded to a Pagan empire and a Pagan senate. The arch of triumph erected by the senate and people bears witness at the same time to the truth of the miracle in ambiguous phrase, while it shows that as yet the senate would not acknowledge Christianity. The inscription says that "he conquered the tyrant, instinctu divinitatis," but no cross is to be seen on the monument. Eusebius says that Constantine, not wishing to oppose the prejudices of the senate, out of policy did not take notice of it ; but that he erected in the city the cross on an obelisk, with an inscription that “ Under this salutary sign I freed the senate and people of Rome from the yoke of tyranny.” As to the argument drawn from coins of Constantine, it may be observed that the first Christian emperors on their medals and inscriptions have the Pagan title of “ Pontifex Maximus,” which in its original signification is “ Builder of the Bridge.” And Valentinian is so inscribed on the Bridge of Cestius. These remarks are extracted from the Abbé Gaume.

The vision of Constantine and the finding of the Holy Cross by St. Helena are unacceptable to the enemies of the Cross. Father Alford, in his “ Ecclesiastical Annals,” has an able dissertation on this subject, in which he gives the arguments to prove the British extraction of St. Helena.

The story of the Greek historian, Nicephorus, that St. Helena was the daughter of an innkeeper at Drepanum, is shown to be false, by the impossibility of reconciling it with chronology. He says that Constantinus Chlorus, on his embassy to the East, lodged in the house of an innkeeper at Drepanum, in Bithynia, and had a son by his daughter ; that on his return to Rome he was created Cæsar with Galerius, A.D. 292 ; that for fear of the jealousy of Theodora, he sent the boy Constantine to be brought up in the court of Nicomedia, where he was imbued with Christianity.

According to this story—improbable on account of the much-praised continence of Chlorus—Constantine would have been fourteen years old when he was proclaimed emperor, whereas he was thirty-three. His age shows that he was born when Chlorus was commander in Britain, to which he was sent in the time of the Emperor Aurelian. It is certain, moreover, that Maximian, when he required of Chlorus to marry his step-daughter, Theodora, demanded the divorce of Helena, and therefore she was the wife of Constantius. It is true that by the laws of Rome a man of senatorial rank in command of a province could not legitimately take a provincial to wife, unless he chose to do so after his office had expired. This may account for St. Helena being called by some the partner of Chlorus, but not his wife. She was, according to Eutropius and other historians, the daughter of a British prince who was the host of Constantius, or, as some say, the keeper of the horse, his stabularius, and hence the opprobrious name given to St. Helena of Stabularia. St. Ambrose in his sermon seems to attribute this reproach to the Jews, because she adorned the stable at Bethlehem.

Baronius thinks that Nicephorus may have confounded Britannia with Bithynia, and as Drepanum was called Helenopolis, and adorned by Constantine, have supposed it was the place of her birth.

By English historians she is said to have been born at Colchester, and the old arms of that city bore a cross in her memory. It is thought that Constantius Chlorus derived from her his goodwill to Christians, and it is said by some that he was converted before he died. The character of Constantine, and especially his esteem of chastity, betokens some early Christian impressions, and it is a remarkable coincidence that the adoration of the Cross, which was so special a characteristic of early British Christianity, should have been spread in the whole world by St. Helena and Constantine.

The holiness of St. Helena, venerated as a saint by the Catholic Church, and the respect and love borne to her by Constantine, is a sufficient refutation of the calumnies of her enemies, and the silence of Eusebius on subjects which give glory to Rome and Catholicity is no argument, unless it be in her favour. She is styled in an ancient inscription, "Venerabilis et piissima Augusta."

PRAYER BOOKS.

Garden, Little, of the Soul. Edited by the Rev. R. G. Davis.

With Imprimatur of the Archbishop of Westminster. This book, as its name imports, contains a selection from the "Garden of the Soul" of the Prayers and Devotions of most general use. Whilst it will serve as a Pocket Prayer Book for all, it is, by its low price, par excellence, the Prayer Book for children and for the very poor. In it are to be found the old familiar Devotions of the "Garden of the Soul," as well as many important additions, such as the Devotions to the Sacred Heart, to Saint Joseph, to the Guardian Angels, and others. The omissions are mainly the Forms of administering the Sacraments, and Devotions that are not of very general use. It is printed in a clear type, on a good paper, both especially selected, for the purpose of obviating the disagreeableness of small type and inferior paper. Fifteenth Thousand.

Garden of the Soul. (WASHBOURNE'S EDITION.) Edited by the Rev. R. G. Davis. With Imprimatur of the Archbishop of Westminster. Twentieth Thousand. This Edition retains all the Devotions that have made the GARDEN OF THE SOUL, now for many generations, the well-known Prayer-book for English Catholics. During many years various Devotions have been introduced, and, in the form of appendices, have been added to other editions. These have now been incorporated into the body of the work, and, together with the Devotions to the Sacred Heart, to Saint Joseph, to the Guardian Angels, the Itinerarium, and other important additions, render this edition pre-eminently the Manual of Prayer, for both public and private use. The version of the Psalms has been carefully revised, and strictly conformed to the Douay translation of the Bible, published with the approbation of the LATE CARDINAL WISEMAN. The Forms of administering the Sacraments have been carefully translated, as also the rubrical directions, from the Ordo Administrandi Sacramenta. To enable all present, either at baptisms or other public administrations of the Sacraments, to pay due attention to the sacred rites, the Forms are inserted without any curtailment, both in Latin and English. The Devotions at Mass have been carefully revised, and enriched by copious adaptations from the prayers of the Missal. The preparation for the Sacraments of Penance and the Holy Eucharist have been the objects of especial care, to adapt them to the wants of those whose religious instruction may be deficient. Great attention has been paid to the quality of the paper and to the size of type used in the printing, to obviate that weariness so distressing to the eyes, caused by the use of books printed in small close type and on inferior paper.

"This is one of the best editions we have seen of one of the best of all our Prayer Books. It is well printed in clear, large type, on good paper."—Catholic Opinion. A very complete arrangement of this which is emphatically the Prayer Book of every Catholic household. It is as cheap as it is good, and we heartily recommend it."—Universe. "Two striking features are the admirable order displayed throughout the book, and the insertion of the Indulgences in small type above Indulged Prayers. In the Devotions for Mass, the editor has, with great discrimination, drawn largely on the Church's Prayers, as given us in the Missal."—Weekly Register.
